MR. BILBO. Mr. President, in my discussion prior to the roll call I was directing the attention of the Senate to the wholesale and reckless loss brought about by the liquidation of the First National Bank of Gulfport; and I had incorporated in the Record as a part of my remarks certified copies which show the petitions of the receiver that were filed and presented to the court for his approval. The poor depositor of the bank knows nothing about them. He has no way of "getting next." He is on the outside. All this is monkey business taking place between the court and the receiver; and I desired to bring this committee of depositors before the committee in order to develop just how bad the situation was in this particular liquidation in Gulfport.

I have had several reports as to other liquidations, where it seems that the instructions of Mr. Lyons were that the "sore thumb" cases should receive special consideration at the hands of the judge, and that he has not complied. But I was urged not to bring any additional information against this judge, the impression being left with me that I had brought enough, and that the charges which I had brought would be investigated. But I find that after I cease to bring additional charges the matter is closed without the subcommittee investigating the charges which are preferred.

I wish to direct the attention of the Senate especially to what I believe to be one of the most serious charges preferred against Judge Holmes in this investigation. The sponsors for Judge Holmes will try to lead Senators to believe that Senator BILBO, who is known far and near as a prohibitionist, hailing from a prohibition State, had suddenly blossomed into a defender of the poor bootleggers down in Mississippi. I want it distinctly understood that I have been a prohibitionist all my life, and I am still a prohibitionist, and, with rare exception, by both precept and example. I am no defender of the bootlegger; but I cannot understand why my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] should slurringly refer to the man who is charged with the sale of liquor down in the State of Mississippi.

MR. PRESIDENT, law is a strange thing. Under the laws passed by men like us, an act may be perfectly all right today, it may be honorable, it may be dignified, it may be just the thing to do, yet we get a peculiar slant on life and on social conditions, and by mere enactment of the representatives of the people we provide that the act that is honorable today will be dishonorable tomorrow, and the act that was dishonorable yesterday is honorable today. That is the way I look at the liquor business.

I have seen respectable people, honorable people, right here in the city of Washington, who are today selling whisky at the drug stores and the grocery stores, here, there, and everywhere. They are gentlemen; they enjoy good social standing; they are honest and honorable. Just because down in dry old Mississippi a few of our citizens try to come to the rescue of the dries by furnishing them corn in liquid form at an oasis in the desert, I do not believe they should be altogether outlawed. I believe that, in spite of the fact that a man would sell whisky, he could tell the truth. But my friend tried to leave the impression on the Senate that I have been trying to make out a case against Judge Holmes with a bunch of old bootleggers. Not so, my colleagues. I am trying to make out a case of the most willful, vicious, ignorant administration of law that can be found anywhere in this country. I do not think such conditions can be found anywhere else.

In order to understand this charge I desire to take sufficient time of the Senate to call attention especially to the law. Immediately after the World War, when the United States became dry, Congress passed the liquor law, which provided:

Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall, for a first offense, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not exceeding 6 months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than 1 month nor more than 5 years.

That was the general penalty clause of the prohibition law of 1919, passed immediately after the World War.

Things rocked along, and the enforcement of the national prohibition law did not seem to have the proper effect, and Congress, in its very great desire to clean up the country, on March 2, 1929, passed an additional law, known as the Jones law, which was an amendment of the general prohibition statute of 1919. In that law Congress provided:

That wherever a penalty or penalties are prescribed in a criminal prosecution by the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, for the illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor, as defined by section 1, title 2, of the National Prohibition Act, the penalty imposed for each such offense shall be a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed 5 years, or both: Provided, That it is the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law.

Congress passed a general prohibition law in 1919 and fixed as the penalty for violation a fine up to $2,000, or 6 months' imprisonment. That did not seem to have the desired result. There seemed to be wet spots throughout the country in spite of the law. Enforcement seemed to have broken down. So Congress, in its great desire to provide a real test, and to put teeth in the law, in 1929 passed the Jones Act, which increased the penalty to $10,000 or 5 years in the penitentiary, not a new penalty, but an increased penalty, that is all. That is all Congress was trying to do, to increase the penalty to $10,000 or 5 years, so that the big boys could not pay off and get by. It was the intention to get them all.

That law as passed had no reference to the quantity of whisky which a man might sell. He could sell a pint, or a quart, or a gallon, or 5 gallons, or 500 gallons, it did not make any difference, but if he sold whisky he could be punished. Congress said that it was the intent that the court should discriminate between casual violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor. After a conviction was had, it was all right for the court to take testimony to determine the character of the prisoner and the extent of his violations.

On January 15, 1931, Congress amended the Jones law—and the Jones law was an amendment of the prohibition law; so we now have the law, and we had it as it was when prohibition was repealed under the Democratic administration, as follows:

That the proviso in the first section of the act entitled "An act to amend the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented", approved March 2, 1929, is hereby amended to read as follows—

Now note this:

That any person who violates the provisions of the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, in any of the following ways: (1) By a sale of not more than 1 gallon of liquor as that word is defined by section 1 of title 2 of said act:

Provided, however, That the defendant has not theretofore within 2 years been convicted of a violation of the said act or is not engaged in habitual violation of the same; (2) by unlawful making of liquor * * * shall for each offense be subject to a fine of not to exceed $500 or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both.

Then follow the penalties for these violations:

That is the law. Lawyers in Mississippi and persons who are keeping an eye on the way things are moving reported to me that Judge Holmes was acting in open violation of this act of Congress and flying in the face of the opinions of the appellate courts of the country and was railroading to the penitentiary not 1, not 2, not 14, not 100, but 500, yea, a thousand, of the poor, defenseless violators down in Mississippi.

I do not know what Senators think about a penitentiary sentence; but it strikes me there is not anything more harmful to contemplate than for a man to be jerked from the bosom of his family for the offense of selling liquor. When such a man is sent to the penitentiary it wrecks his home, wrecks his family, demoralizes them, puts a stigma and an odium and disgrace upon the family, blights the future of the boys and girls who are young, full of life, and looking to the future with ambition. I care not if the father has violated the law. In Washington it is not a violation of the law to sell liquor. It is an honorable act. Down in Mississippi it is a violation of the law. This judge has railroaded to the penitentiary, as I said, not a dozen men but a hundred, five hundred, yea, a thousand, in direct violation of the statute of Congress.

Did Senators know that the subcommittee did not want me to prove that? They said, "Bilbo wants to bring up here a lot of bootleggers to prove that they got an unjust sentence." No; the subcommittee has never even seen the list of my witnesses.

The other day, when I was begging members of the subcommittee to subpoena these witnesses, I said, "I have here another list of witnesses. I want to give you the names of witnesses, whom I can bring here, who will substantiate these charges, dependable witnesses, witnesses who will tell the truth. Of course, if you do not want to believe a man who has been charged formally with the sale of liquor when it is not a violation of law today, if you do not wish to take such a witness's word for it, there are other witnesses I can get, and I propose to get them." No; instead of letting me show that, they proposed to bring Judge Holmes and Mr. Todd up here to show that it was not so bad after all; that it was "much ado about nothing."

I repeat, I am not defending the bootlegger; but I am trying to show Senators that they have before them a judge who is so reckless, or who is so vicious, or who is so ill-informed, or who is so indolent that he will not find out what the law is; and to put him on the bench of the fifth circuit to review the act of other judges is to my mind unthinkable. I think I can show Senators that it is so.

I cited correspondence with the subcommittee in my vain attempt to get the witnesses subpoenaed. I ask unanimous consent to have this correspondence printed in the Record at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The correspondence is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
February 1, 1936.

Senator EDWARD R. BURKE,
Senator KEY PITTMAN,
Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN,

Members of the Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary Investigating the Matter of the Confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes.

GENTLEMEN: Since receiving the transcript or copy of the proceedings before your honorable committee, in the matter of the confirmation of Judge Holmes, I feel that, in the interest of justice and a proper presentation of all facts, I should appeal to you to reopen this hearing and take further testimony, and I earnestly urge that you extend your investigation, going fully into the matters hereinbefore mentioned.

First, I think it advisable to reopen the case and take the testimony of Judge T. Webber Wilson, who lives here in Washington and is now a member of the National Parole Board, having recently served as Federal judge in the Virgin Islands. In my reply brief to the brief filed by Hon. Gerald Fitzgerald, I refer to the political activities of Judge Holmes in Mr. Wilson's race for the United States Senate. I clearly overlooked the development of the facts in this matter, and I think this testimony is pertinent to contradict conclusively the contentions of Judge Holmes to the effect that he was nonpartisan and never took a part in politics. Of course, Judge Holmes should have an opportunity to be heard on this point after introducing the testimony of Mr. Wilson and others to thoroughly substantiate the point.

Second, never dreaming that there would be an effort made by my colleague to urge the confirmation of Judge Holmes at this session of Congress over my objections, and knowing that Judge Holmes was personally obnoxious to me, and that I would never give my consent to his confirmation, I made no extensive investigation into his record, but since the closing of this hearing I have been reliably informed by a member of the Mississippi bar of incidents or acts of Judge Holmes that should be conclusive to the committee and the Senate in reaching a decision to decline further promotion of this man in the Federal judiciary. I have reference to additional acts besides those already urged before this committee. Judge Holmes is either so ill-informed as to his duties and the law governing him in his functions as a judge, or his absolute indolence and indifference as to what his duties and powers are, that at the February term of the circuit court at Biloxi, Miss., he imposed sentences in open court on quite a number of citizens, and after sending them to jail, and after being advised by the district attorney, those citizens had to be brought back into open court and resentenced.

About 4 or 5 years ago one of the most unthinkable, unjustifiable, illegal, and unconscionable acts of Judge Holmes was perpetrated upon a reputable white citizen of Amite County, Miss. I am reliably informed, and believe the records will show in this case, that upon the conviction or plea of guilty of a man by the name of Day, a citizen of Amite County, Miss., and a member of one of the leading families of that county, Judge Holmes sentenced him to 2 years in the Atlanta Penitentiary, and after serving in the penitentiary for about 14 months of the 2 or 3 years' sentence it was discovered that Judge Holmes violated the law in imposing this penitentiary sentence for a violation that carried only fine and imprisonment.

I am informed, and believe, that other citizens were likewise sent to the penitentiary without authority of the law, and that an investigation of the facts will show these charges to be absolutely true. These acts of Judge Holmes were committed after he had been on the district bench for many years and are therefore absolutely inexcusable.

If these charges are true, and I believe them to be because my source of information is absolutely reliable, it would be unthinkable that the Senate of the United States could entertain for one moment a promotion of such a man to the court of appeals. The mere thought of an autocratic and tyrannical Federal judge incarcerating illegally, and without authority of the law, a citizen of this country in the Federal penitentiary is so abhorrent to our conception of the rights and freedom of our people until I am sure this committee could never get its consent to rush the confirmation or promotion of a judge in the Federal judiciary until time and opportunity have been freely granted to determine the verity of such a horrible miscarriage of justice.

Third, I want to renew my urgent request that the committee go thoroughly into the investigation of Judge Holmes' actions or acts that contributed to the wasteful and unthinkable dissipation of the assets of the First National Bank of Gulfport, to the great harm of about 6,000 depositors in this bank. I am just in receipt of a telegram stating that in one instance a party connected with this bank stole $10,000 of the bank's money and, because of political influence and pull, the judge merely gave him a suspended sentence. I am sure if you gentlemen will go into the investigation of the court's action in approving the unconscionable dissipation pation of the bank's assets in this case, you will be convinced beyond every reasonable doubt that Judge Holmes is totally unfit to be a reviewing judge or to serve on the circuit court of appeals—the court, in many cases, of last resort.

Fourth, I again renew my request that you demand of Judge Holmes the list of my personal and political friends—lawyers—from whom he claims to have received information that I had expressed willingness to approve his appointment. I want the names of these attorneys, and I want them summoned before your committee. If Judge Holmes fails to make good his boast, I want it made a part of the record and brought to the attention of the whole committee.

All these facts are pertinent to the issue before you, and will most certainly have great bearing upon any committee in reaching a righteous conclusion.

In this connection, I want to state frankly to the committee that I sought the permission of President Roosevelt to place his telegram to me in the RECORD, which I promised to do, and that the President expressed a hope that it would not be necessary to use his telegram, since the matter was thoroughly covered in the letter of Senator HARRISON, dated August 20, to Attorney General Cummings and the President, which letter is in evidence in the case and referred to by Senator HARRISON in his statement. This letter should have been published as a part of the record, and I am asking that it now be considered a part of the record.

I want to assure this committee, in asking that this hearing be reopened, that I have no desire to unnecessarily delay the consummation of this matter. I am as anxious as any Member of the Senate to dispose of this matter as expeditiously as possible. There is no pressing cause for rushing this matter. I am only seeking to bring before the committee all the pertinent facts affecting the fitness, qualifications, and other requisites that a judge should possess before being promoted to such a responsible position on the bench as a member of the circuit court of appeals.

If, in your wisdom, you desire to refuse the requests that I am making as hereinabove stated, I want to ask that this petition be made a part of this record, for discussion before the whole committee and the Senate, when this matter is being finally considered, and that I be given an opportunity to be heard before the whole committee when and if the matter is taken up for discussion before that committee.

With appreciation, I am,
Yours faithfully,

THEO. G. BILBO,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
February 3, 1936.

Senator THEODORE G. BILBO,
Senate of the United States.

DEAR SENATOR BILBO: As chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee investigating the matter of the confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes as judge of the circuit court of appeals, fifth circuit, I wish to acknowledge receipt of your communication which was delivered to me this morning about 10 o'clock by your Mr. Smith.

The other members of the subcommittee read your letter just prior to the opening of the meeting of the Judiciary Committee. As a matter of courtesy to you and without consideration as to the merits of your request to have further hearings before the subcommittee, we determined to make no report this morning.

I am sure you will agree that every opportunity was afforded you to present all relevant matters at the hearings which were concluded on January 25. This applies to the compulsory process in securing the attendance of witnesses and court records as well as in the matter of continuances of the time of hearing.

The committee feels that if the hearings are now to be reopened, it should be only upon some definite showing as to the materiality of any further evidence that may be offered. The committee, therefore, requests that in considering your application it should have before it answers to the following questions:

1. You request that the testimony of Judge T. Webber Wilson be taken in connection with your contention that Judge Holmes has been active in politics. Kindly indicate what you expect to prove by the testimony of Judge Wilson or anyone else concerning the political activities of Judge Holmes.

2. You say that you have now discovered that Judge Holmes imposed sentences at the February term of the circuit court at Biloxi on a number of defendants and that on the advice of the district attorney these parties had to be brought back into open court and resentence. Please inform the committee what witness or witnesses you have in mind to call to establish the above allegation. What was the nature of the charges against these parties and what change in sentence was required?

3. In reference to the party by the name of Day, of Amite County, Miss., what was the offense for which he was sentenced to serve 2 years in the penitentiary and what is the statute applicable thereto?

4. You refer to an official of the First National Bank of Gulfport who stole $10,000 of the bank's money and received only a suspended sentence. Kindly furnish the committee with this party's name and a statement concerning what evidence you have that the action of the court was influenced by political considerations.

5. Judge Holmes offered to furnish a list of your personal and political friends who had informed him that heretofore you approved of his appointment. The committee sees no advantage in going into that matter, does not care to have the list of names furnished, and does not propose to call them before the committee.

In conclusion, the committee feels that a very thorough hearing has been had and consideration given to the question of the qualifications of Judge Holmes. It is, therefore, reluctant to reopen the hearings and does not propose to do so unless you furnish some very definite evidence that something of a material nature bearing on the qualifications of Judge Holmes will be presented.

We trust that you will give a very prompt response to this communication.

Yours very truly,

EDWARD R. BURKE.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
February 4, 1936.

Senator EDWARD R. BURKE,
Senate of the United States.

MY DEAR SENATOR BURKE: I am just in receipt of your esteemed favor of February 3, the same being in reply to my letter addressed to the members of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigating the matter of the confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes, of which subcommittee you have the honor to be chairman.

I note that your committee "feels that if the hearings are now to be reopened", according, as I have most respectfully requested, "It should be only upon some definite showing as to the materiality of any further evidence that may be offered." Therefore, to the end that this showing may be made as a preliminary step to the reopening of the hearings, you, on behalf of your committee, have propounded to me four interrogatories to which I am requested to make answers.

It is my desire to comply fully with this expressed wish of your committee—in fact, to cooperate with the members thereof in every possible way so that full, complete, and dependable information in the nature of essential and material evidence may be made available for their use and consideration in arriving at final determination with respect to this important matter.

Consequently I am leaving for Mississippi this week for the purpose of securing the data required by your committee on the four cases referred to in your recent favor. Although the task assigned to me is one of considerable magnitude and will entail very appreciable costs in both money and time, I cheerfully undertake it, and, insofar as it is humanly possible, will in due time bring before your honorable committee satisfactory answers to the very definite and specific questions it has addressed to me.

I hope that my return with this requested data will be not later than Thursday or Friday of next week, but if, by any circumstance, it is necessarily delayed beyond that date, I most respectfully ask that no further action be taken in regard to the confirmation of Judge Holmes until I am ready and shall have been permitted to submit in writing my findings of facts.

Slightly digressing from the main purpose of this letter, I think it within the proprieties for me to convey to you my disappointment upon being advised by you that your committee saw no advantage in going into the matter of having Judge Holmes make good his boast that he could furnish a list of my personal and political friends who had informed him that I had approved his appointment. You will recall that I challenged Judge Holmes to submit that list and urged the committee to bring the parties he listed to Washington to testify to the truth or falsity of that statement. If Judge Holmes' voluntary declaration on this point could be impeached, or if he should refuse to furnish this list in an attempt to make good his boast, when ordered by the committee to do so, then it would follow that his qualifications for the appointment he sought would be materially impaired.

With grateful appreciation for this further opportunity accorded me to cooperate with your committee in placing before it additional material evidence having a direct bearing upon the essential question of qualifications involved in the hearing affecting the confirmation of Judge Holmes, I beg to remain,

Faithfully yours,

THEO. G. BILBO, United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
February 17, 1936.

Senator EDWARD R. BURKE,
Senator KEY PITTMAN,
Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN,
Members of the Subcommittee on the Judiciary Investigating the Matter of the Confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes.

GENTLEMEN: In asking this honorable committee to reopen the hearing in the matter of the confirmation of Judge Holmes, I want to again especially call the attention of the committee to the fact that I never dreamed that there would be any effort made on the part of my distinguished colleague, Senator Harrison, to urge or persist in Judge Holmes' confirmation at this session of Congress, when he was fully advised of my objections to the confirmation of Judge Holmes and to the fact that because of his unwarranted mistreatment of me, as the records in this case will show, that Judge Holmes was personally obnoxious to me, and for this reason I made no effort before coming to Washington to attend this session of Congress, to investigate any of the facts involving the record of Judge Holmes touching upon the question of his fitness and qualifications for promotion to the position of judge of the United States Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit.

So your committee can readily appreciate the handicap under which I have been acting in ascertaining facts pertinent to the investigation.

I want to personally thank the committee for their kindness in delaying to report on this matter so as to give me time to make a hurry-up investigation, which I have attempted to do during the few days I was permitted to be in Mississippi.

First, I therefore renew my request that this subcommittee reopen the hearings in this matter in order that the following matters may be inquired into, and the facts concerning them fully developed before the committee, and if that is done I am convinced that this committee will find that the illegal sentence passed by Judge Holmes upon me was not the only case where he acted without authority of, and contrary to, the law, but that he has acted beyond his powers and has passed sentences illegally and contrary to the statutes in a number of other cases, and that the prisoners have been either released by other Federal judges in the districts where the prisoners were incarcerated, or remanded back to Judge Holmes to be resentenced in accordance with the law.

I also desire to establish that the statement of Judge Holmes that since he went on the Federal bench in Mississippi he has not participated in politics is untrue, and that as a matter of fact, he has actually participated in politics and became a vital instrument in a political campaign in 1928 for the United States Senate, leaving his court and his home and traveled approximately 150 miles to a political meeting in Neshoba County, Miss., where he got up in the meeting and made a statement in behalf of Senator Hubert D. Stephens, who was then a candidate for reelection against Hon. T. Webber Wilson, then a Member of the House of Representatives, and is now a member of the Federal Parole Board; and that that political statement of Judge Holmes contributed to the defeat of Mr. Wilson.

I therefore desire and request that a subpoena be issued directed to Judge T. Webber Wilson, who resides in the city of Washington, at the Annapolis Hotel, and who has an office in the Department of Justice in Washington, and also a subpoena directed to Col. Richard G. Wooton, who lives at 1726 Upshur Street NW., Washington, D. C., and who has an office in the Department of the Interior in this city, who was the campaign manager of Mr. Wilson in that campaign. Both Mr. Wilson and Colonel Wooton were present in Neshoba County at said political meeting at the time Judge Holmes made the statement in question, and will verify the facts herein charged.

I submit that the primary purpose of our fathers in writing into the Constitution of the United States that Federal judges should be appointed for life, or as the Constitution terms it—"during the period of good behavior"—was to entirely remove Federal judges from politics, and that they should not only not be obligated to support any party or ticket but that they should enter into no participation whatsoever in political activity. This political activity on the part of Judge Holmes, as established, is absolutely material as affecting his fitness and qualifications for promotion in the judiciary. And further, this political activity, when proven, confirms the fact that he was not immune from being motivated for political reasons in the imposition of an illegal and unwarranted sentence upon me at Oxford in 1923, while I was a candidate for Governor of my State, and I might say it serves still another purpose. This testimony, if I am permitted to bring it before the committee, will thoroughly impeach the credibility of Judge Holmes as a witness before this committee and will certainly have bearing upon his qualifications and fitness for more honors in the judiciary.

Second, in the matter of Jonathan Day, of Amite County, Miss., I wish to call the committee's attention to the fact that Judge Holmes on November 4, 1931, arbitrarily and contrary to and in violation of the law, sentenced said Jonathan Day to the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., for a period of 3 years for the possession of and sale of 1 pint of whisky; and Mr. Day was taken to the penitentiary by the United States marshal for the southern district of Mississippi, and there incarcerated, where he was put to work at hard labor in a factory in the penitentiary; and after about 5 months he was transferred with a gang of Federal convicts to Fort Bragg, N. C., where, for about 8 months, he was put to hard labor building roads in the military reservation at that place. After serving about 14 months at hard labor under said sentence of Judge Holmes, he was advised and informed by a fellow convict that Judge Holmes had passed an unlawful sentence upon him in that he had sentenced him to the penitentiary and to hard labor, and had found him guilty of a felony when the maximum penalty for the crime to which he pleaded guilty was only a misdemeanor, with the maximum penalty of "a fine not to exceed $500 or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both."

Thereupon Day sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina, and upon a hearing thereof at Greensboro, N. C., before the Honorable Isaac M. Meekins, United States district judge, he was promptly and finally discharged by order of Judge Meekins.

In this connection, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that section 91, title 27, of the United States Code which governs penalties for violation of the National Prohibition Act as then standing upon the statutes, provided as follows:

"Sec. 91. Maximum penalties; petty offenses: Wherever a penalty or penalties are prescribed in a criminal prosecution by this title, for the illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor, as defined by section 4 of this title, the penalty imposed for each such offense shall be a fine not to exceed $10,000 or imprisonment not to exceed 5 years, or both: Provided, That any person who violates the provisions of this title, in any of the following ways: (1) By a sale of not more than 1 gallon of liquor as that word is defined by section 4 of this title: Provided, however, That the defendant has not theretofore within 2 years been convicted of a violation of this title or is not engaged in habitual violation of the same; (2) by unlawful making of liquor, as that word is defined by said section, in an amount not exceeding 1 gallon, in the production of which no other person is employed; (3) by assisting in unlawfully making or unlawfully transporting of liquor, as above defined, as a casual employee only; (4) by unlawfully transporting not exceeding 1 gallon of liquor, as above defined, by a person not habitually engaged or employed in, or not theretofore within 2 years having been convicted of a violation of such law, shall for each offense be subject to a fine of not to exceed $500 or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both (Mar. 2, 1929, ch. 473, sec. 1, 45 Stat. 1446, as amended Jan. 15, 1931, ch. 29, 46 Stat. 1036).

A reading of the above statute clearly shows that a person indicted for the first offense under the National Prohibition Act involving a sale of liquor in an amount less than 1 gallon, the maximum penalty fixed by the statute is: "A fine of not to exceed $500, or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both."

In the hearings before this committee on January 24, 1936 (p. 76) of the printed hearings, Judge Holmes frankly admitted that at the time he passed a sentence upon me in a fine of $100 and imprisonment for 30 days, he had not looked at the statute and did not know that he had passed sentence upon me in violation of the statute, and further stated that if he had looked at this statute, he would have seen that it provided for a fine, or imprisonment, but he did not. And he further stated: "I frequently sentence without looking at the statute, when I know the sentence I am going to give is small and well within the power of the court", which leaves the implication before this committee that if severe sentence should be passed by him upon an accused he would be careful to look at the statute.

Well, here is a case of a most severe sentence, of a young man with a wife and several small children, from a reputable family, who had never before been accused of any crime, where Judge Holmes passed a sentence upon him, either without looking up the law relating to sentence in such a case, or in total disregard of the law. This shows either that Judge Holmes is so incompetent and indifferent to his duties as a Federal judge, or too indolent to find out what the law is, or that he acts arbitrarily and tyrannically and in disregard of the law and of human lives.

Can this committee think of anything more horrible in this land of freedom, where the rights of our citizens are so jealously guarded and protected, than a Federal judge taking a citizen away from his loved ones and branding him with the stripes of a felon and putting him at hard labor for 3 years, thereby casting a disgrace and an odium upon the citizen and his loved ones that can never be removed, and a deprivation of his civil rights as a citizen of the United States and the State of Mississippi when the charge which he was arraigned for was only a misdemeanor?

Furthermore, the record shows, on page 83 of the official hearing in this case, that Judge Holmes was totally unfamiliar with the citation, both as to the witness statute and the statute relating to sentences in cases of contempt in the Federal court. The sentence of Jonathan Day shows that he was evidently ignorant of the statute governing sentences in liquor cases as well.

I am further reliably informed that Jonathan Day, after his arrest, was advised by an officer in Judge Holmes' court that he should plead guilty and not appear in court with counsel, as Judge Holmes was very much opposed to any person accused under the National Prohibition Act appearing in court with an attorney.

I therefore respectfully request that a subpoena be issued for Jonathan Day, at Liberty, Miss., and to the clerk of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of North Carolina, Raleigh, N. C., for a copy of the entire record and proceedings in the matter of the application for a writ of habeas corpus by Jonathan Day.

I also desire a subpoena issued to Mr. M. H. Daily, at Coldwater, or possibly Jackson, Miss. These witnesses and court records will show the truth of all the matters hereinbefore charged in the Day case.

I am herewith filing with this committee a certified copy of the indictment and the order of the court in the Day case.

Third, I am advised that one Garrett Longmeyer, of Amite County, Miss., was, on November 4, 1931, sentenced by Judge Holmes to the United States penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., for 1 year and 1 day for the possession and sale of less than 1 gallon of whisky in violation of the National Prohibition Act, and that was the first offense charged against the defendant, and Judge Holmes, in that case, also sentenced the defendant to the penitentiary contrary to, and in violation of, section 91 of title 27 of the United States Code, in that he gave him a sentence to the penitentiary at hard labor for a first offense for the sale of liquor in an amount less than 1 gallon, a specific violation of the provisions of said statute, which limited the penalty in such cases to a fine of $500 or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both. Longmeyer served his sentence before he discovered that the judge had exceeded his authority in passing sentence upon him.

I respectfully request a subpoena directed to Mr. Garrett Longmeyer, of Liberty, Miss.

Fourth, I am advised that on November 4, 1931, Judge Holmes sentenced one Edgar Neyland, of Amite County, Miss., to the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., for a period of 30 months for the possession and sale of whisky, less than 1 gallon, in violation of the National Prohibition Act. Neyland served about 11 months in the penitentiary and was paroled before he was advised that Judge Holmes had exceeded his powers in sentencing him to the penitentiary in violation of section 91, title 27, of the United States Code, the offense charged against Neyland being his first offense.

I therefore request a subpoena be issued, directed to Edgar F. Neyland, of Liberty, Miss., for his appearance before this committee.

Fifth. In the matter of Joe Ainsworth, of Smith County, Miss., who was accused of the sale and possession of whisky in an amount less than 1 gallon, Judge Holmes, on November 3, 1931, sentenced Ainsworth to the Hinds County jail at Jackson, Miss., for a period of 90 days for possession of the liquor, and sentenced him to the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., for a period of 5 years for the sale of said liquor.

Ainsworth had not been charged for an offense within 2 years prior to his conviction, and the sentence passed upon him by Judge Holmes was clearly in violation of section 91, title 27, of the United States Code, in that the sentence passed upon him sentenced him to the penitentiary at hard labor for 5 years when the statute specifically provided that the penalty in such a case should not exceed a fine of $500 or confinement in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both.

Ainsworth was taken to the Atlanta Penitentiary under the sentence of Judge Holmes, and remained there, at hard labor, from November 11, 1932, until September 15, 1933, when, upon the hearing of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus filed by him in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, the United States district judge for the northern district of Georgia ordered that he be returned to the custody of the United States marshal for the southern district of Mississippi to be brought before the Federal court in Mississippi (Judge Holmes' court) for resentencing upon the ground that he had been given a sentence by Judge Holmes without authority of law.

Ainsworth was remanded to the United States marshal, and on September 26, 1933, Judge Holmes entered an order by which he modified and reduced his previous sentence and directed that the prisoner serve an additional 6 months from and after September 26, 1933, when he had already served over 10 months in the penitentiary, and notwithstanding the fact that the Federal court in Georgia had remanded Ainsworth into the custody of the United States marshal of Judges Holmes' court for the purpose of having him resentenced, in accordance with the law. Judge Holmes inflicted still further punishment upon the prisoner in violation of the law. He had served over 10 months illegally in the penitentiary, which was more than the penalty which Judge Holmes was permitted to inflict upon him.

He therefore should have been promptly and immediately discharged by Judge Holmes when he appeared before him on September 26, 1933, for resentencing, because he had already served more than 6 months, which was the maximum sentence authorized by law.

I, therefore, respectfully request that a subpoena be issued directed to Joe Ainsworth, at Meridian, Miss., directing that he appear and testify before this committee, and I also request that a subpoena be issued to the clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, for all of the records and proceedings in the matter of the petition of Joe Ainsworth for a writ of habeas corpus.

In this connection, if the committee desires to know the whole truth about the carelessness, recklessness, and tyranny, and constant disregard of the rights of the citizens of this country within his jurisdiction, especially with respect to the sentences that he has imposed as evidenced by the cases presented to the committee up to this time, if you will make an investigation of the proceedings of his court at Biloxi, Oxford, Vicksburg, Jackson, Meridian, Clarksdale, and Aberdeen, I verily believe that you will find 75 or 100 cases where he has without any regard for the law governing those cases violated the rights of the citizens of my State and passed illegal sentence upon them.

In the short time I have been making this hurry-up investigation, I have been told of other cases where he has abused his power and rights as a judge, and I have been assured that records will be sent to me within the next few days confirming the statement that I am now making.

In the above and foregoing cases, I am filing with this committee certified copies of the indictments and orders of the court, showing on their face that Judge Holmes has willfully and otherwise prostituted the powers and functions of his office with utter disregard of the rights of the citizens of my State.

I respectfully submit that the excuse that a defendant may appeal a case and by that method correct the errors committed by a Federal judge is no excuse for such errors being committed. Many citizens who are accused of crimes for the first time are totally unfamiliar with the statute under which they are accused and of the penalties which may be imposed, and any Federal judge who will pass sentence upon a prisoner, sentencing him to the penitentiary without having informed himself with the statute, is either so ignorant or careless that it is conclusive evidence of his incompetence and unfitness to become a member of an appellate court, which is called upon to review the errors committed by other Federal judges. If a trial judge is so careless and reckless and ignorant of the law in passing sentences upon defendants, and in entering judgments and decrees in his court, how can he be expected to search the records for errors with that great care and caution which all expect appellate judges to do in order to perform their full duty as judges of an appellate court?

A man who looks so lightly upon his own errors cannot be expected to look with any degree of severity upon errors committed by other judges.

I stated in my opening statement to this committee that Judge Holmes is personally obnoxious to me. He is personally obnoxious to me not only because he passed an illegal sentence upon me directly contrary and in violation of the law, but he is personally obnoxious to me because of his carelessness, recklessness, and tyrannical conduct upon the bench in passing sentences upon ignorant and penniless citizens of the State of Mississippi, in violation of their statutory and constitutional rights, inflicting upon them ignominy and shame and depriving them of their civil rights as citizens of the United States and of the State of Mississippi, contrary to the law.

I, therefore, feel that I would be violating my oath of office as a Senator of the United States to support and defend the Constitution of the United States if I did not object to the confirmation of a man whose own admissions and whose judgments show that he has either willfully or through incompetence violated his oath of office to defend the laws and the Constitution of the United States.

As stated to you in a previous letter, Judge Holmes was either so ill-informed or indifferent as to the law and his duties that at the February 1935 term of his court at Biloxi, Miss., he sentenced quite a bunch of prisoners and sent them to jail. Afterward these prisoners had to be brought back to open court and all resentenced. I am not advised as to the crimes for which these prisoners were convicted, neither am I personally advised as to the sentences imposed illegally at first, and neither do I know personally the final sentences imposed, but these facts can be substantiated by attorneys present at this term of court and by the district attorney and the clerk of the court.

I am, therefore, asking you to issue a subpoena for Attorney A. Y. Harper, of Jackson, Miss., who is assistant district attorney there, and B. L. Todd, Jr., clerk of the court, at Jackson, Miss.

I have insisted from the beginning of this hearing, and still insist, that in order for this committee to know and fully appreciate the utter disregard, indifference, recklessness, and favoritism displayed by Judge Holmes in the exercise of his powers and functions as a judge that it is imperative that your honorable committee make an honest-to-goodness investigation of the unthinkable, indefensible, and unconscionable dissipation of the assets of the First National Bank of Gulfport and the First National Bank in Gulfport.

This national-bank institution, before its crash, under the administration of Mr. Jaygoe, who now holds an important position in the Treasury Department here in Washington, was considered one of the strongest banking institutions in Mississippi. It had over 6,000 depositors. The laboring man's life savings, the widow's every dollar, the farmer's meager savings throughout a lifetime for his old age, the young man's savings to finish his college education—in fact, the bank enjoyed such a wide and substantial reputation for stability that its depositors came from all walks of life in many counties of south Mississippi.

The stock in this bank was owned and controlled by many people of reputed great wealth, some of them even in the millionaire class, and the stock was owned and the bank controlled by the high and mighty of the political world.

Right here I want to ask the committee to issue a subpoena duces tecum for Hon. J. F. T. O'Connor, comptroller of the currency, directing him to bring before this committee a list of the assets and liabilities of these two banks, giving the names and addresses of all parties and the amount owing by each.

There were so many rumors of fraudulent and shady deals and transfers immediately following the closing of this institution that the depositors held a mass meeting and selected a committee from their ranks to make investigations and to attempt to protect their rights. When this committee, headed by Hon. J. F. Galloway, of Gulfport, asked permission to investigate the list of stockholders and the list of those who had been permitted to take from the bank the money of the depositors, this committee was told they might come into the bank, but they denied them the privilege of taking paper and pencils, and were positively prohibited from making any notes while looking into the list of debtors to this bank, and to its assets and liabilities.

I am submitting herewith for your consideration a letter from the chairman of the depositors' committee, addressed to the ex-mayor of Biloxi, Hon. Hart Chinn, and also a brief statement showing the loans of the directors, officers, and to corporations owned and controlled by such directors and officers of these banks. This statement shows that 75 percent of the directors and officers, owning less than $30,000 worth of stock, had borrowed $131,203.80 which is approximately $4.50 for every dollar's worth of stock that these officers and directors owned in the bank.

In the liquidation of the assets of this bank, under the absolute direction of Judge Holmes, the disposition of the assets of the bank and the release of those who owed the bank and were abundantly able to pay both their stock liabilities and for notes due and owing the bank, such gross favoritism was shown, authorized, and permitted by the court, that this committee, I am sure, would hesitate to recommend Judge Holmes' promotion if it knew the truth of this miserable story of financial tragedies.

I am having certified copies of many of these questionable deals made from the records at Gulfport, and had expected to have them here this morning as they were to be mailed at Gulfport on Friday night, and I will file these with the committee either this afternoon or tomorrow, as I confidently believe I will receive them today.

Just after this bank closed an agent of the Department of Justice uncovered the theft, or embezzlement, of about $10,000 by one of the bank's officers by the name of Searle Hewes, who was highly connected in the social and political life of Gulfport and Harrison County. The grand jury indicted this party for this embezzlement of the depositors' trust funds in this national bank, and Mr. Hewes plead guilty, offering no excuse nor mitigating circumstances. It was a straight-out positive theft of the bank's money, but, because of the political and social prominence of this party and because of political pressure or influence, Judge Holmes sentenced him and then sent him on his way rejoicing with a suspended sentence.

Other citizens of this district can sell a pint of whisky, and he sent them to the penitentiary for 1, 2, 3, and 5 years, where they were put at hard labor; but this gentleman of social and political standing, who had perhaps taken the widow's last dollar and caused the poor laboring man's children to cry for bread and almost go naked on the streets of Gulfport, yet he goes free.

A certified copy of the indictment, sentence, and order of the court in this case will be filed with the committee just as soon as these bank papers can be gotten from Gulfport, which were mailed, I understand, Friday night.

I am going to ask the committee to permit me to file a list of the names of the witnesses to establish all these facts in connection with this bank matter sometime today or tomorrow. I am asking those who are making these investigations for me to give me the names of these witnesses by whom all these facts can be proven.

I cannot conclude this petition without again pleading with the committee to compel Judge Holmes to furnish a list of my personal and political friends who had informed him that heretofore I approved of his appointment and would look with favor upon his confirmation. Judge Holmes vainly tried to put me in a false light before this committee by making this boast, when I know and he knows it is untrue, and I want the committee to give me an opportunity to prove to you that his statements are not true—that his statements are not dependable—that in many respects he is totally irresponsible. If I am not mistaken, in the issue before this committee, this kind of proof is vitally material, affecting the fitness, worthiness, and qualifications of Judge Holmes on the question of his promotion in the judiciary.

In conclusion, I want to assure this committee that I have spared neither time, effort, nor expense in endeavoring to assist the committee in ascertaining the true facts about Judge Holmes.

In your letter of February 3 you asked me to give the names of witnesses and what I expected to prove by them. I have honestly tried to carry out your suggestion, and I assure this committee that if you will reopen this hearing and have the witnesses, whose names I have suggested, before you and secure the additional documentary evidence which can be brought before this committee, and make the investigations suggested, that you will be convinced of the verity of practically every statement I have made. This is a very serious question to be decided. It is important in the interest of justice and good government. There is no need or cause for haste. This session of Congress will be continuing for many weeks. Let us work together and find out the whole truth. I have nothing to conceal. Judge Holmes is not entitled to a promotion, and with the cooperation of this committee there won't be a "doubting Thomas" left when we get to the bottom of the whole matter.

I respectfully ask that this petition and the documentary evidence filed herewith, together with certified copies of the bank records that I expect to file as soon as I receive them, all be made a part of this record, regardless of the decision of the committee. I shall ask permission to discuss this petition and these records if this matter ever reaches the floor of the Senate.

I renew my request to be heard by the whole committee.

With appreciation for your kindness and forbearance, I am,

Respectfully yours,

THEO. G. BILBO,
United States Senate.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
February 17, 1935.

Additional and supplemental matters to petition filed by Senator THEO. G. BILBO asking for a reopening of the hearing in the matter of Judge Edwin R. Holmes' confirmation before the Subcommittee of the Judiciary in the United States Senate

Gentlemen of the committee, in my petition to you dated February 17 I made mention of the fact that I was expecting immediate delivery of additional documentary proof bearing on the question of Judge Holmes' fitness and qualifications as a result of the reckless, unwarranted, and unconscionable dissipation of the assets of the First National Bank of Gulfport, Miss., and the First National Bank in Gulfport, Miss., by his orders of settlement, to the great harm and pecuniary loss of the 6,000 depositors of these banks.

I am submitting herewith certified copies, six of the several hundred settlements approved by Judge Holmes. By a careful analysis or perusal of these petitions and approving orders of the court you will get a slight conception of just how much favoritism and preference was shown by Judge Holmes to the high, mighty, and wealthy in these banks.

The last hope of these 6,000 depositors rested in the judge of the district Federal court. Judge Holmes alone had the power to say to the receiver that these men of wealth and influence—men and women who were abundantly able to make good their obligations to the depositors or to the banks—shall not be forgiven of their debts, and because of Judge Holmes' recklessness, indifference, or favoritism the unfortunate depositors of these banks had to suffer the loss—in many cases the savings of a lifetime.

Please permit me to direct your attention to a careful study of these records.

Hon. Hart Chinn, ex-mayor of Biloxi, Miss., through whose kindness and assistance these certified court documents have been furnished me, has made some timely observations to assist me, pointing out in each instance the gross negligence on the part of Judge Holmes in giving his permission to each of these settlements and thereby finally releasing debtors to these banks who were abundantly able to pay in full.

I am also filing with this supplement the court record certified to in the case of Searle Hewes, who robbed the bank and, upon a plea of guilty, was given a suspended sentence of only 3 years. I am informed that this indictment of 10 counts covered only a part of the debt and cold-blooded theft of the depositors' money. As a matter of fact, I understand that his embezzlement amounted to over $10,000.

I want to ask the committee to issue a subpoena to Hon. J. L. Galloway, chairman of the depositors' committee, and Hon. R. C. Edwins, P. H. White, and A. E. Kramer, all of Gulfport, Miss., and all members of the depositors' committee. Through these gentlemen I expect to prove many of the details of how the assets of these banks have been dissipated by orders of Judge Holmes. If you will bring these gentlemen, who are outstanding and reputable citizens of Gulfport, Miss., before you, you will in part expose the most shameful and shocking series of fraud ever practiced upon the unfortunate depositors of a failed bank, in this case amounting to over 6,000 in number.

I also want to ask for a subpoena for Herman Phafhausen, of Handsboro, Miss. I expect to prove by this gentleman, who is a citizen of unquestionable integrity, how officers of the court and others prevented defrauded depositors from appearing before the grand jury at Biloxi, Miss., to bring justice to parties guilty of perpetrating criminal fraud upon the defenseless depositors of these banks.

I also want a subpoena duces tecum directed to Hon. B. L. Todd, Jr., clerk of the district court and custodian of the records of the court, to appear before this committee and bring with him all the court records and copies of petitions and other transactions connected with the settlement or liquidation of the assets of the First National Bank of Gulfport and the First National Bank in Gulfport.

Neither time nor expense should be spared in determining the truth about the affairs of this bank and the dissipation of its assets with the knowledge and by the orders of Judge Holmes. It should be done as a matter of simple justice to the 6,000 depositors.

I want to again assure the committee that I am doing and have been doing everything that time would permit to assist the committee in knowing the truth, in order that a righteous conclusion can be reached in this very important matter.

Respectfully submitted.

THEO. G. BILBO.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
February 21, 1936.

Senator EDWARD R. BURKE,
Senator KEY PITTMAN,
Senator WARREN R. AUSTIN,

Members of the Subcommittee of the Committee
on the Judiciary Investigating the Matter of the Confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes.

GENTLEMEN: Since your notice over the telephone to me a few minutes ago that you contemplate calling your committee together for the purpose of taking only the testimony of Judge T. Webber Wilson, and that you would also take the testimony of the former United States Senator Hubert D. Stephens, evidently on one of the many matters that I have charged against Judge Holmes in my letter, or petition, on February 17, together with the addenda thereto, I am constrained to plead with the committee to the extent of seriously objecting to such a reopening or rehearing of the case, unless the case is reopened for an investigation of all the charges made, and of any other charges, or such matters as I desire to present before the time set for such reopening or rehearing, and such matters as may arise as a result of the matters developed in the hearing.

Please do not understand me as attempting to suggest or control the action of the committee in any procedure that, in its good judgment, it should decide upon, but I feel that, upon reconsideration, you will appreciate the righteousness of my contention in objecting. You could readily see how manifestly unfair it would be to pick out one or two matters upon which to reopen the case, and deny an opportunity to furnish evidence on matters and charges far more vital and material than the one item upon which you propose to examine Judge Wilson and ex-Senator Stephens.

Since you telephoned me I have attempted to contact Colonel Wooten, who was Wilson's campaign manager at the time Judge Wilson was making the race for the Senate, and the only witness whose name I have given that was present and heard the joint debate between Judge Wilson and Senator Stephens. Of course, you appreciate the fact that Wilson and Stephens were the participants in the debate. I was anxious to have Judge Wilson's campaign manager testify, but I find that Colonel Wooten was called to Hattiesburg, Miss., several days ago, which is his former home, and will not return to this city until one day next week.

Trusting that you gentlemen will fully appreciate the spirit in which this communication is written and that you will appreciate the correctness of my position, I beg to remain,

Yours respectfully,

THEO. G. BILBO,
United States Senator.

Mr. BILBO. I named Jonathan Day, Mr. Longmeyer, Mr. Neyland, and Mr. Ainsworth as four who had been indicted for misdemeanors in connection with violation of the liquor law, and the judge, in violation of the reviewing court's opinion, had pronounced these men guilty of felony and sent them to the penitentiary. The condition got so bad, and it is so bad, that when these men were sent to the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta, their homes wrecked, and the lives of their children blighted because of this illegal and unlawful and "heroic" treatment which Judge Holmes is giving them down in Mississippi, somebody suggested to them that the judge had certainly violated the law, and that if they would apply for a writ of habeas corpus in the United States district court in Atlanta, Ga., they might get justice; but they could not get it in Mississippi. So one of the men who had been sent to the penitentiary because of Judge Holmes' lack of a judicial mind and understanding of what the law is, applied for a writ of habeas corpus.

I desire to read to the Senate the opinion of Judge Underwood, who discusses the case. I am going to take time to read to Senators this opinion of Judge Underwood, passing upon the act of Judge Holmes, this man who has such a splendid preparation for the appellate court of our country.

Petitioner, on April 18, 1932, pleaded guilty to an indictment of two counts, charging him with having, on January 11, 1932, unlawfully possessed and sold "intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky", without setting forth any particular amount of whisky so possessed and sold.

The indictment did not charge a gallon or more. It did not charge that he was an habitual violator of the law.

He was, on the same day, sentenced to be confined in the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga., "for a period of 1 year and 1 day from the date of his delivery"—

Judge Holmes generally gives them from 2 or 3 to 5 years—and was received at the penitentiary and began the service of the above sentence on April 24, 1932.

On November 17, 1932, petitioner filed an application for a writ of habeas corpus, praying for his discharge from respondent's custody on the ground that the sentence was void, because in excess of what could be lawfully imposed under the amendment of January 15, 1931, to the National Prohibition Act.

And he filed his habeas corpus predicated his defense upon the act of Congress that was passed on the 15th of January 1931, a law which my friend, Judge Holmes, never seemed to have been able to find out about. He does not even now know that it is the law.

The pertinent parts of the amendment are as follows:

That any person who violates the provisions of this title, in any of the following ways: (1) By a sale of not more than 1 gallon of liquor as that word is defined by section 4 of this title: Provided, however, That the defendant has not theretofore within 2 years been convicted of a violation of this title or is not engaged in habitual violation of the same; * * * shall for each offense be subject to a fine of not to exceed $500 or to be confined in jail, without hard labor, not to exceed 6 months, or both.

Omitting the caption, the indictment was in the following language:

"The grand jurors of the United States, impaneled, sworn, and charged at the term aforesaid of the court aforesaid, on their oath present, that on or about the 11th day of January 1932, in the county of Washington, in the western division of said district, and within the jurisdiction of said court, William Pace did knowingly, willfully and unlawfully possess intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky fit for use and intended for use for beverage purposes, said act being then and there prohibited and unlawful; and being further in violation of and otherwise than as authorized or permitted by the National Prohibition Act, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States.

"Count 2. And the grand jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do further present, that the said William Pace on the 11th day of January 1932, in the county of Washington, in the western division of said district, and within the jurisdiction of said court, did knowingly, willfully and unlawfully sell intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky fit for use and intended for use for beverage purposes, said act being then and there prohibited and unlawful; and being further in violation of and otherwise than as authorized or permitted by the National Prohibition Act, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States."

While the indictment is in two counts, the first alleging the unlawful possession and the second the unlawful selling of the whisky, the first count is not material, since the penalty for unlawful possession is a fine only, and could not support a penitentiary sentence; so that no fine having been imposed, the sentence, if valid at all, must be supported by the second count.

The question presented is, then, whether an indictment for the sale of whisky, brought under the Prohibition Act as amended January 15, 1931, for an offense committed after January 15, 1931, which fails to allege that the amount of intoxicating liquor involved is more than 1 gallon, will support a sentence greater than the maximum authorized by said amendment, and directing imprisonment in a penitentiary.

Under the Jones law (45 Stat. 1446), prior to its amendment, the quantity of the liquor sold was immaterial, and the same sentence, up to a maximum of 5 years in the penitentiary, could be imposed whether the amount involved was 1 or 100 gallons. There was a provision which informed the courts that it was "the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law."

This proviso, however, was "only a guide to the discretion of the court in imposing the increased sentences for those offenses for which an increased penalty is authorized by the act." * * * Apparently sentences under the Jones law, despite the expressed intent of Congress, oftentimes were so severe for minor offenses or by Congress thought to be, that this wide discretion left the judges was restricted by the amendment of January 15, 1931, which undertook to classify as casual or slight violations all transactions involving 1 gallon of intoxicating liquor or less, provided the defendant had not, within 2 years, been convicted of violating the National Prohibition Act and was not a habitual violator, and fixed the maximum term of imprisonment at 6 months in jail, which, of course, could not be served in a penitentiary.

The circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit, in the case of Foster against United States, says: "The recent act (Jan. 15, 1931) amending this proviso by fixing lesser maximum penalties for minor offenses would persuasively suggest that thereby Congress intended to substitute definite maximum penalties for the merely advisory or recommendatory phrasing of the original proviso."

This amendment carved out certain offenses from the Jones law and made them misdemeanors, leaving the others punishable as felonies. There could not be included in the latter class any case which falls in the misdemeanor class, and any sentences imposed in the last-mentioned class which exceed the maximum penalty provided by the amendment, or provide for the service of such sentences in a penitentiary, would be void as beyond the jurisdiction of the court and subject to be set aside on a habeas corpus proceeding.

This being true, the indictment must allege, as essential elements of the offense, the fact that more than 1 gallon of liquor is involved or that defendant has been convicted within 2 years of violation of the act or was engaged in habitual violation of same. If such allegation is not made, the indictment will be held to allege the lesser offense only, and any sentence providing for imprisonment in a penitentiary or in a jail beyond the maximum term provided by the amendment would be void.

That is exactly what Judge Holmes is doing. He has done it not only in one case, but he has done it in hundreds and thousands of cases. When we look over the penitentiary walls at Atlanta today we see men wearing felons' stripes and working in the penitentiary of the United States who are guilty only of misdemeanors, just because we have a judge who does not even understand the statute when he reads it or is unwilling to apply it if he should understand it.

In such cases habeas corpus is the proper remedy. * * * The defendant has a right to be informed by the indictment as to whether he is charged with a misdemeanor, with a maximum imprisonment of 6 months in jail, or a felony, with a maximum imprisonment of 5 years in a penitentiary.

Senators who are lawyers know that is the fundamental law of the land, that a man charged with a crime should know by the indictment with what he is charged so he may know what defense to prepare.

The proof by which a charge is sought to be sustained does not constitute the crime. It is the charge made in the information or indictment that determines the character of the crime and not the evidence by which the crime is proved.

A plea of guilty is a plea only to the offense legally charged in the indictment, and, where the indictment may be sufficiently specific, in the absence of a demand for bill of particulars to support a sentence for a lesser offense, but not for a greater offense described in the statute, the indictment must be held to charge only the lesser offense.

It is necessary that the allegations bring the accused clearly within the intent of the statute prescribing the additional punishment. In this respect the charge must be definite and certain. So if such is a statutory element, it must appear that the offense was committed after a prior conviction, and where the statute provides that the additional punishment shall be imposed where defendant has before been sentenced, it is necessary to allege the sentence, but not merely that the accused has been convicted. * * * A prior conviction should be alleged directly and not by recital.

It appearing in this case that the maximum penalty which could have been legally imposed upon petitioner is a fine of $500 on the first count and imprisonment in jail for 6 months or a fine of $500, or both, on the second count, and it appearing that petitioner has already served in the penitentiary more than the maximum time that could have been legally imposed, even if 6 months' imprisonment and two fines of $500 each has been imposed, and 30 days' service for nonpayment of each fine had been required, the writ is sustained and petitioner ordered discharged from the custody of respondent.

In other words, the petitioner was released from the custody of the warden of the penitentiary.

That was the case where Mr. Pace filed his writ of habeas corpus in Judge Underwood's court at Atlanta and was very promptly discharged.

I now have the same case entitled Aderhold v. State (65 Fed. Rep., second series, 790). Senators may ask why I read the same case. The opinion which I have just read is the opinion of Judge Underwood, who is the district judge holding a position similar to that held by Judge Holmes in the judiciary. That was the opinion he wrote in releasing Pace from a wrong sentence, an illegal sentence, and outrageous sentence imposed by Judge Holmes. The district attorney prosecuted an appeal from Judge Underwood's judgment. Issue was taken with Judge Underwood. Here is the opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Fifth Circuit, and one of the strange things about it, just a coincidence, is that Judge Nathan P. Bryan, the man whose shoes Judge Holmes is seeking to get into, was the man who wrote the opinion that condemned the unfitness of Judge Holmes in this case. Listen to what Judge Bryan says. He passed away last August, but he concurred in this opinion with two other circuit judges. I read:

This is an appeal by the warden of the Atlanta Penitentiary from an order granting the writ of habeas corpus and discharging William E. Pace, a prisoner, from custody. On his plea of guilty to an indictment which charged him with unlawfully selling on January 11, 1932, "intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky", but without alleging the quantity sold, Pace was sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the period of 1 year and a day. After serving more than 6 months, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus, contending that the sentence in excess of 6 months was void, as it was held to be by the district judge.

We think the decision was correct. Under the National Prohibition Act the maximum imprisonment authorized for the first offense of selling was 6 months. By the Jones Act of March 2, 1929, it was increased to 5 years regardless of quantity; but by the amendment of January 15, 1931, the maximum punishment originally provided for a first offense in the event of a sale of not more than 1 gallon was restored, and was in force in 1932 when Pace made the sale on account of which he was indicted. Before the amendment of 1931, the severity of the sentence did not necessarily depend on the quantity of liquor sold, and it was therefore held that the quantity need not be alleged in the indictment. * * * But since the adoption of that amendment the quantity alleged to have been sold becomes of vital importance to the defendant. If he sells a gallon or less, he has committed a misdemeanor and cannot be punished by imprisonment exceeding 6 months in jail; whereas if he sells more than a gallon, he has committed a felony, and can still be imprisoned for 5 years in the penitentiary. The indictment ought, therefore, to allege whether the sale was of a gallon or less, or of more than a gallon. Without such an allegation the trial court has no guide for determining the maximum punishment which he is authorized by law to impose.

Judge Holmes did not confine this to one case. He sent people to the penitentiary by the carload. Some people from some of the best families in my State are today branded with the name of "felon" because of this judge's indifference, indolence, carelessness, viciousness, recklessness—I do not know what—but, whatever it is, it certainly unfits him to be put on the appellate bench to review the action of other judges and other courts.

The mere sale of liquor is a misdemeanor; the sale of more than a gallon aggravates the offense into a felony. Any aggravation of an offense for which the law authorizes an increase of punishment must be stated in the indictment.

That is Bishop.

Mr. Bishop also says that to punish one for all of a crime where only a part of it is charged is to punish him without accusation. So far as we are aware there is no authoritative decision to the contrary. Certainly it cannot fairly or justly be said that Pace, because he pleaded guilty to a charge of selling an unnamed quantity of intoxicating liquor, thereby admitted he had sold more than a gallon.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

I am going to make out a case against Judge Holmes for sending hundreds and thousands of my people to the penitentiary in violation of this Federal statute, in violation of the decisions of the courts. I do not have to use bootleggers as witnesses. I can produce before the committee, down yonder in the committee room, eight Federal judges who will tell you, gentlemen of the committee, and will tell the Senate, and will tell the world, that Judge Holmes has openly and flagrantly violated the laws of Congress and has flown into the face of the decisions of the courts.

Here is the case of Olivito against United States, found in Federal Reporter, second series, volume 67. This is a case that arose away out West, in the ninth circuit—one of these same cases. This is what the court said:

It is true the court may have had at hand other facts, not shown by the record, tending to establish habitual violation; but under the present law the discretionary power has been removed and the court is empowered to sentence only upon the findings of a jury, based upon appropriate allegations of the indictment.

That is all I need to read in that case, because after a full discussion of the same class of cases the court holds that the indictment must charge the offense for which the defendant is sentenced. In other words, under the act of Congress passed on the 15th day of January 1931, if a man is indicted for violation of the liquor law, the indictment must show that he has sold more than a gallon, the indictment must show habitual violation; and, if it does not, any judge who dares to send that man to the penitentiary does so in open violation of the direct, positive mandates of the law of this Nation and flies in the face of the opinion of the appellate courts of this country.

When I had Judge Holmes on the stand, trying to find out by what mental processes this man had construed the laws of Congress and had interpreted the decisions of the court, and why it was that he was sending hundreds of my constituents to the penitentiary in open violation of the law, I said, "Why are you doing it?" Listen to what he said:

I was relying, and still rely in support of those sentences on the case of Husty v. United States, in Two Hundred and Eighty-two United States Reports, page 694.

The Husty case came up from the State of Michigan. A man was indicted for selling whisky in Michigan, strange to say; and the case went up to the circuit court of appeals, and then, by special writ, was brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Justice Stone delivered the opinion in the case, and he makes it very clear. Let me take a moment of your time to read this, because here is where Judge Holmes hangs his hat, and here is where he has left the laws of Congress and flies in the face of the decisions of the courts of the country.

Judge Stone says:

The indictment is in the form authorized by section 32 of the National Prohibition Act. It charges the transportation of intoxicating liquor as a first offense by both petitioners, and possession as a first offense by Laurel, and as a third offense by Husty, at a named time and at a place within the jurisdiction of the court. Failure to state more specifically the amount of the liquor and the time and place of the offenses charged does not affect the validity of the indictment. It was, at most, ground for a bill of particulars if timely application had been made.

It is urged that the indictment is defective because it fails to state whether the offenses charged were felonies or misdemeanors and whether the petitioners were charged with casual or slight violations or habitual sales of intoxicating liquor or attempts to commercialize violations of the law, which, petitioners argue, were made new or aggravated offenses by the Jones Act.

The court is talking now about the Jones Act of 1929:

But the Jones Act created no new crime. It increased the penalties for "illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation or exportation", as defined by section 1, title II, of the National Prohibition Act, to a fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or both, and added as a proviso, "That it is the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor or attempts to commercialize violations of the law." As the act added no new criminal offense to those enumerated and defined in the National Prohibition Act, it added nothing to the material allegations required to be set out in indictments for those offenses. The proviso is only a guide to the discretion of the court in imposing the increased sentences for those offenses for which an increased penalty is authorized by the act.

That is the law as laid down by the United States Supreme Court, interpreting, explaining, justifying the action of Congress in enacting the Jones Act of 1929. That was the law as finally adjudicated by the highest tribunal of the country. But when Congress appreciated the fact that judges had gone wild, and that they were abusing this discretion, and imposing sentences running all the way up to $10,000 fine and 5 years' imprisonment, Congress, on January 15, 1931, said that certain acts shall be misdemeanors in violation of the prohibition law, and these misdemeanors must be charged as facts; and if a misdemeanor is charged, and a man pleads guilty, then no court has a right to take ex-parte testimony and elevate that crime into something other than the one charged in the indictment.

That is what this judge has done in the cases of thousands of my people. I say "thousands" because his clerk said the other day that they had 2,000 such cases a year, and he has been at it since 1931. That is 5 years, and that would be 10,000 cases. Thousands of my people, good people, men, who come from good families, who have gone astray—just because a man makes one mistake in life is no evidence that he is totally bad, and men from the best of families make mistakes—these men who had violated the law, grant you they did, were entitled to the protection of the law. They were indicted by the district attorney for a misdemeanor, charged with a misdemeanor, pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor, were convicted of a misdemeanor; and this judge, in open defiance of the act of Congress of 1931 and the opinions of all the courts, has sent these men by the trainload to the penitentiary, wrecking the men, wrecking their homes, wrecking their families, and branding them for life as felons.

That is what he has been doing, that is what he is doing, and that is what I have been asking the committee to allow me to show.

It was said that I had some old bootleggers I desired to produce. I wired the clerk of the court at Atlanta a few days ago to send me a list of the cases where the poor devils had found out that Judge Holmes had put up a job on them. He immediately sent me a certified copy of just what had happened down there. This is what he sent:

In the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia

I, J. D. Steward, clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, do hereby certify that the records of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of Georgia disclose the following facts with reference to sundry habeas-corpus cases instituted in said district court, to wit: 337, J. Will Culpepper; 448, Everett S. DePew; 574, H. T. Holland; and 637, Joe Ainsworth, sentenced in the southern district of Mississippi, were ordered returned to the court of original jurisdiction for resentencing, and 405, Edgar Neyland; 478, Louis A. Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, before the committee Judge Holmes explained this strange and unusual process by which, in defiance of the law, in defiance of the statute, in defiance of the opinions of two circuit courts of appeals—one in California and one in the fifth district—he has carried on his inquisition. He says that when a man comes into court and pleads guilty, regardless of what is charged in the information, he holds a kind of an ex-parte performance. He said he did not know whether those who testified were sworn or not, and he left the record that way—"I would not want to say whether they were sworn or not."

He brings in prohibition agents; first the head man, who sits in an office in Jackson, and this man who has letters, who has complaints, who has nothing but a bundle of hearsay testimony, and after all this hearsay stuff has been accumulated by this head prohibition man from the enemies of the man who is charged, and from the chronic kickers in the community, and from every other source, he unloads that upon the defendants in an ex-parte way, hearsay evidence, and with that hearsay evidence he elevates the crime from that of a confessed misdemeanor to a felony, and sends the man to the penitentiary. He says, "In doing that I am relying upon the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as announced in the Husty case", which permitted that kind of monkey business; and he says, "I relied then and I still rely upon it"; and he does not know that Congress has changed the law.

He says he found out that Congress had changed the law about a subpoena 40 days after it passed the law, when he wanted to put Bilbo in jail, but he has not yet found out, in 5 years, that Congress has done away with his method of sending people to the penitentiary illegally and unlawfully.

Some Senators may say, "Well, it would not do to vote against the confirmation of a judge just because he sent some bootlegger to the penitentiary." Granting that to be true, do not Senators think that the rights and liberties of the people of this country mean something to the United States Senate? If this judge did what he is charged with doing, then he is disqualified, he has not a judicial mind. He is either too ignorant to find out what the law is, or he would not know the law when he found it. In my case, he was too lazy to find out what the law was, and I think that might be true in these liquor cases. A lazy judge has no business on the appellate bench in this country.

The records I offer to exhibit cannot be brushed aside. If the Senate will send this case back to the committee, and the committee will permit me to furnish a list of the witnesses, I will bring reputable witnesses, I will bring the judges themselves, and I will prove beyond any reasonable doubt that this judge has made victims not only of the hundreds he has sent to the penitentiary, who have already gone there, and, in their ignorance, have served their sentences and gone away with the stripes on their records forever, but others will be found in the penitentiary now, because Judge Holmes says, "I am still pursuing that policy. I am still relying upon the Husty case."

Before concluding my remarks I wish to direct attention to the report of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire to make some observations on this report, and I do so because the report has been given to Senators to read.

The report is not signed by the committee. It is signed only by the chairman. I take it that the subcommittee joins in the general conclusions reached, but the verbiage is that of my distinguished friend the junior Senator from Nebraska.

On page 1 he says:

The committee sat for 3 days and examined a considerable number of witnesses, some of whom were subpoenaed at the request of the junior Senator from Mississippi, and the other witnesses appeared voluntarily.

I have already directed the Senate's attention to the fact that with all this hearing, the junior Senator from Mississippi has been permitted to have subpoenaed only four witnesses, and one of those turned traitor, and there have been brought before the committee witnesses and affidavits in behalf of Judge Holmes to the number of 23. Does that look like a fair and square investigation?

There are still charges pending, and I have put those charges in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I desire the people of Mississippi and Members of the Senate to read them. I desire to know if the Senate would be willing to confirm a man in the face of those charges without any opportunity being given to establish them here. The mere explanation of Judge Holmes will not satisfy. The mere cumulative evidence of his clerk, Mr. Todd, will not satisfy. As a United States Senator, I am standing here and telling the Senate that I can establish these charges. After I have been permitted to do it, it will be up to the Senate to say whether or not to disqualify this judge.

The chairman of the subcommittee says:

After the hearings were concluded, the junior Senator from Mississippi requested in writing that the hearings be reopened so that further evidence could be taken. He presented a list of names and a statement of what he expected to prove. This was done at the request of the subcommittee. A further hearing was held, but only one witness named by the junior Senator was requested to appear. The committee then felt that all of the material evidence was presented and that no good would be accomplished by continuation of the hearings.

"No good"! In other words, by that statement the chairman of the subcommittee is willing to say that the things I charge against Judge Holmes would not disqualify the judge. When I charge that he violated the law repeatedly—one hundred, five hundred, yea, a thousand times—and that innocent people by the hundreds and the thousands have been sent to the penitentiary in violation of the law and the opinions of the courts of this country, the committee does not think that amounts to anything. That is what the committee says in its written report.

The overwhelming weight of the evidence presented is to the effect that Judge Holmes is preeminently qualified to fill the position to which he has been nominated.

If you keep the witnesses away, you will not have any evidence. They keep my witnesses away, and, as a result, they say the evidence is strong for Holmes. But if you let the case go back to the committee, and let me bring the witnesses here, you will read the next time a different report from that of my distinguished friend from Nebraska.

This is the unanimous judgment of the subcommittee, which had the benefit of seeing and hearing Judge Holmes in person.

He mesmerized them. He is not the same judge I saw down at Oxford on the 16th day of April 1923. I was told all along that the question of personal objection would cut no figure in the action of the subcommittee.

On page 4, I call attention to the observation of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee with respect to the resolution of the State Legislature of Mississippi, at which time he says I was Governor:

The record shows that the resolution endorsing the appointment of Judge Holmes to the fifth circuit court of appeals to fill a vacancy then existing, was unanimously adopted by both houses of the Legislature of Mississippi, and that the friends of Governor BILBO exercised the controlling voice in the legislature.

I desire to be perfectly frank with the Senate, Mr. President. I knew nothing of this resolution until it was presented before the committee here in Washington. I had never heard of it.

It amounted to nothing. It effected no result. The Republicans were in power in Washington. It was during the second session of my legislature. The house was organized against me. The senate was with me, it is true. In those hectic closing days in the Governor's office—and some Senators have been Governors and know what it means—this resolution did pass. When I stated to the committee that I had no recollection of it, and never heard of it, my friend from Nebraska said he had great trouble in reaching the conclusion that I did not know anything about it. Senators will understand that he is laboring to believe me. Of course, I am sorry for the mental processes through which he must pass.

However, in order to satisfy myself, and in order that Senators may know, I sent a telegram to two of the ex-Governors of Mississippi who understand our procedure down there and know how these things happen and how they come about. I desire to read the telegrams to the Senate:

HON. THEODORE G. BILBO,

United States Senator:

Answering your telegraphic inquiry, Mississippi procedure does not require Governor's approval of legislative resolutions, and they are not brought to his attention officially either before or after passage, except where the resolution is specifically directed to the Governor. Therefore, it is possible that resolutions were passed during my term of office of which I have never been informed.

SENNETT CONNER.

Replying to your wire this date, will say, "yes"; it was possible for the legislature, during my time as Governor of Mississippi, to pass resolutions not requiring the Governor's signature or approval. At the moment, I am unable to cite instances. Am morally sure, however, that such was a legislative custom, as such resolutions were passed but never brought to my attention officially, "if at all", until the legislature was adjourned.

A. H. LONGINO.

Under our system of legislation, such a thing is altogether possible, as testified to by these two ex-Governors, one of whom, ex-Governor Conner, went out of office in January last, and the other of whom, ex-Governor Longino, is now county judge in the capital of our State. They corroborate the statement I made, and I tell the Senate, as a matter of fact, that I knew nothing about it until the matter was presented before the committee. It was just one of those resolutions which were passed in the busy, closing days of the session, and it was never brought to my attention. It did not amount to anything.

The statement of the junior Senator from Nebraska continues:

The resolutions and other communications above set forth are merely typical of the great mass of evidence favorable to confirmation. No communications have been received from anyone questioning the qualifications of the nominee other than may be found in the statements of Senator BILBO, as hereinafter set forth.

I have been begging that witnesses be subpoenaed so that I could show the lack of qualification of this judge. Not only that, but I will bring judges here who are indeed judges—judges who hold higher positions in the judiciary than Judge Holmes does—to show, as I can show, that the man has the awful judicial record I charge he has.

I notice, on page 5 of the report, the following language:

The present junior Senator, then an ex-Governor of Mississippi, was duly and properly subpoenaed as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff.

That shows that the Senator who wrote this report has not read the law, because he said I was "duly and properly subpoenaed." I have shown clearly by the opinions of the court and by the law itself that the subpoena was absolutely illegal and unlawful, and yet the committee states that I was properly subpoenaed as a witness.

He refused to appear and succeeded in avoiding service of a writ of attachment. He was later cited for contempt, made a statement to the court which amounted to a plea of guilty—

In other words, the Senator who wrote this opinion is not any better lawyer than is Judge Holmes. He said my statement or explanation of why I did not respond to the subpoena "amounted to a plea of guilty."

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BILBO. I yield.

Mr. BURKE. I think the junior Senator from Mississippi should include all the members of the Judiciary Committee in his characterization of qualifications, because after examination of the evidence they all agreed to the statement I made.

Mr. BILBO. I have an idea that the committee have not examined this matter as closely as I have. I am trying to point out where there may be some omissions and some erroneous statements.

But, sir, granting that all the members of the committee agree with the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that my statement to the court amounted to a plea of guilty, I still take issue. I should take issue with the world on that point, because I think I am lawyer enough to know that a mere statement to a court is not entering a plea of guilty, and, upon reconsideration, I am sure that even the Senator from Nebraska will agree that I am right in the statement. That is the observation I made upon his statement.

I continue my reference to this part of the report. I fail to understand it. On page 6 the Senator who wrote the report has set up an affidavit filed by Judge Holmes, an affidavit by Ex-Governor Russell of Mississippi. I have searched it; I have read it; I have tried to analyze it; I have tried to find out just what connection it has with Judge Holmes' qualifications.

On January 24, when we started these hearings, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Nebraska, said:

We are concerned in this hearing only with such evidence as may be offered and such statement as anyone may care to make concerning the qualifications of the nominee to fill the position to which he has been nominated.

In other words, all the way through the chairman of the subcommittee has insisted that nothing should go into the record that did not have some bearing or some relation to the qualifications and fitness of Judge Holmes. Yet Judge Holmes has incorporated in the record this affidavit from Governor Russell. It has been brought forward by the chairman of the subcommittee and included in his report. For the life of me, I fail to find where it has any bearing upon the question of Judge Holmes' qualifications. When it is analyzed it seems to be a studied effort on the part of somebody, beginning with Judge Holmes, to make attacks upon the junior Senator from Mississippi. This is the most damnable affidavit I have ever seen since I have been in the Senate. It charges me with practically everything in the category.

My understanding of the profound and deferential spirit and rule and regulation prevailing in the Senate is that there should not be attacks upon the personal life of a Senator; but here Judge Holmes comes in and, to defend the charges about his judicial misconduct which I have made and which I have asked an opportunity to prove, files the affidavit of a repudiated ex-Governor of Mississippi for no other purpose than to make a personal attack and personal assault upon the integrity and honor of a United States Senator. That is the only effect it can have. This is in keeping with Judge Holmes' conduct.

I have here a letter from Judge Holmes addressed to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE], dated February 10, in which he said:

I enclose herewith certified copy of an order signed by me in the matter of the liquidation of the First National Bank of Jackson, Miss., to be filed with the record, if you deem proper. It relates to a compromise by Senator BILBO, his cosigners, and endorser of a note for $1,850, plus accrued interest. The proposed settlement was agreed to by the receiver, authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency, and approved by the court. It was a routine matter, appeared to be to the interest of the trust estate, and was signed by me as a matter of course. I submit it to you, without comment, for such use or consideration as you may deem proper.

Here is a Federal judge who is going around digging up a transaction of mine with the First National Bank of Jackson, which he approved and the settlement of which he approved.

I have nothing to hide about it. The facts are I borrowed $2,665 from the First National Bank of Gulfport, the purchase price of a piece of land, and paid it down to $1,850.

When the bank failed and the panic came on I effected a compromise for $1,250 for the balance due on it. I think it was a pretty good settlement under the conditions in view of the value of the property. It has nothing to do with the settlements I have been talking about at Gulfport, but here is this pussyfooting judge going around digging into BILBO's personal affairs, not to help himself, not to show his fitness, not to show his qualifications, but trying to attack the man BILBO. The affidavit was filed here with the committee. Of course, they have had the benefit of it.

The report of the Senator from Nebraska continues:

Your committee finds nothing in the matter of the imposition of a jail sentence upon THEODORE BILBO—

I presume the Senator was speaking about the junior Senator from Mississippi—that in the slightest degree reflects upon the integrity, impartiality, or ability of this nominee.

In other words, the committee reaches the conclusion that notwithstanding the fact that Judge Holmes had illegally issued a subpoena, had illegally issued an attachment, had illegally cited me for contempt, had excessively fixed the bail, had illegally sentenced me, had even violated the law when he did it—in spite of all that "your committee finds nothing in the imposition of a jail sentence upon THEODORE BILBO that in the slightest degree reflects upon the integrity, impartiality, or ability of this nominee."

That is the conclusion of the subcommittee, which continues:

In the light of this testimony, your committee finds no substance to the charge that Judge Holmes, since he has been on the bench, has participated in politics.

In the face of the testimony of Colonel Wooton; in the face of the statements made by Judge Wilson, but later repudiated; in the face of my own statement, because I was an eyewitness and present; in the face of the sworn affidavit of Hodge, who heard the judge make the statement that he had succeeded in putting BILBO out of politics in Mississippi when he put me in jail, yet the committee concludes that he has not participated in politics.

All right.

In connection with the liquidation of the affairs of the First National Bank of Gulfport, I made some reference to the embezzlement committed by one of the officers of the First National Bank of Gulfport, who, through a period of years, with a sharp pencil had cold-bloodedly and deliberately robbed the bank of $10,000 of its money—money that belonged to the widows who had faith in the bank and its officials, money that belonged to the laboring men who had faith in the officials and those in charge of the bank. He was a man 32 years old, a man with a family. He was socially highly connected. Politically, he belonged to a strong faction. Politically, he belonged to Judge Holmes' faction. After an agent of the Department of Justice had gone down and worked up the fact of this embezzlement when the bank had failed, this man walks into the court at Gulfport, Judge Holmes' court, and enters a plea of guilty as charged of stealing $10,000, without any mitigating circumstance on earth; and the judge promptly says, "Go your way; sin no more; not a day in the penitentiary."

Favoritism! Political bias! And the committee says the most that can be said against this is that the judge overstrained the quality of mercy. He must have developed an awful case of mercy between the time I met him in Oxford, Miss., on the 16th day of April 1922, and the time he turned loose this man who had stolen $10,000 of the depositors' money down at Gulfport, a man of high social and political standing; a man who, not through any accident or any sudden impulse of the sort that sometimes causes people to act wrongfully, but a man who, through a period of years, deliberately, cold-bloodedly, week after week, month after month, year after year, steals $10,000; and when caught by an agent of the Department of Justice, with no defense, he walks up and pleads guilty, without any mitigating circumstances or any excuse; and the judge does not give him a day in jail; does not give him any sentence whatever!

I was standing yonder at Oxford, pleading with the judge, and explaining the fact that I had no intention of being in contempt; that I acted upon the advice of lawyers. "No; no; go on to jail!"

There you are. That is the type of man with whom we are dealing.

Now I wish you would listen to these alarming statements:

The sentence imposed in each case—

Speaking about these bootlegger cases—was proper if there was more than a gallon of liquor involved or if the accused was a habitual violator. If neither of those elements was present in the offense, then a misdemeanor only was committed, and the sentence was excessive.

The author of the report states that as a matter of law. That is not the law.

The sentence imposed in each case was proper if there was more than a gallon of liquor involved or if the accused was a habitual violator. If neither of those elements was present in the offense, then a misdemeanor only was committed, and the sentence was excessive.

Two of the defendants, after serving a portion of their time, sued out writs of habeas corpus in other jurisdictions and were released on a holding that the indictments were insufficient to charge a felony. The United States district attorney—

Now, listen to this:

The United States district attorney, who handled all of the prosecutions before Judge Holmes, assumes full responsibility for the proceedings.

The committee at last break down. They at last confess that they have a bad subject on their hands, and that he has made a miserable mess, and they try to skid him on by "passing the buck" to the district attorney, and saying:

The United States district attorney who handled all of the prosecutions before Judge Holmes assumes full responsibility for the proceedings. He then felt, and still feels, that the indictment was sufficient, and he is supported by court decisions.

He is not.

Before sentence was imposed in each case testimony was taken in order to fix the degree of punishment. It is admitted that if the evidence showed a violation amounting to a felony the sentences were proper. The judge and the district attorney state that the evidence did so establish a felony.

Going on and deliberately violating the law of Congress; and they have been at it since January 15, 1931. I would be willing to wager dollars to doughnuts that there are a thousand persons in the penitentiary who were charged with misdemeanors, and have no right under the law to be adjudged guilty of felonies. If that is not enough to justify an investigation, I shall have to be disillusioned.

Senator BILBO has requested the committee to call before it these confessed bootleggers in order that they may contradict the testimony so offered and endeavor to establish that they were guilty only of a lesser offense than that for which they were sentenced.

You see, there has been no evidence offered except when they brought the judge himself in here to do the testifying, to explain the things with which we charged him.

The district attorney makes an affidavit that during the 4 years of his term approximately 2,500 prosecutions were handled by him, more than 80 percent of them before Judge Holmes, and that no reversal was secured in any appeal.

Of course, you know that is not true. I have already produced the records on that point.

After a careful study of all of the evidence presented, and with due regard to the imperative necessity of approving appointments to the Federal bench only in cases where there is no shadow of suspicion, of lack of integrity and ability, we affirm that Judge Edwin R. Holmes is qualified and should be confirmed.

That is the conclusion of the committee.

I think I shall be able to show enough in the record to prove that if I had been given half a chance there would have been some suspicion; there would have been some doubt.

Mr. President, I regret the necessity of detaining the Senate this long to present this matter, but I desired to make the record full and complete. I have done my best to make it consecutive, logical, and sequential, so that those who read may understand. I repeat that I appreciate the odds in a battle of this kind. If I had had a chance to bring witnesses before the committee in substantiation of my position on charges other than those upon which I predicate my personal objections, as against 23 witnesses and affiants produced on the other side, I should not have experienced such difficulty as I have in presenting the matter. But I am convinced—I believe with all my heart, my soul, and my mind that this judge is totally bad; that he is most certainly unfit to be a member of the reviewing bench of the judiciary of this country. Whether it is indolence, whether it is lack of a judicial mind, whether it is because of recklessness, indifference, viciousness, I care not what is decided; the facts speak for themselves. At the conclusion of my remarks I shall make a motion that the nomination be recommitted, and I certainly trust that Senators will give me a roll call on that motion.

I desire to say in conclusion, and I say this deliberately, that as I view Judge Holmes' record of judicial incompetency and abuse of powers vested in him, it is unparalleled in the courts of this country, and in my judgment finds no equal, at any time or anywhere, except in the records made by Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, of England, and Lord Braxfield, his counterpart, "bloodthirsty wearers of the ermine", whose fiendish delight was in the imposition of extreme sentences, and whose cruelty and political profligacy knew no bounds.

According to Lord Campbell, who was at one time also Lord Chancellor of England, Judge Jeffreys began the practice of law when quite a young man, and during his first experience as a barrister was seized with an inordinate desire to rise rapidly in his chosen profession. Among his first acts to elevate himself socially, financially, and politically as a means toward the ultimate purpose burning in his heart, he sought and obtained the hand and heart of an heiress, who was the daughter of a country gentleman of large possessions. From the dismal chambers where he lived, in what was called the Inner Temple, he advanced to the occupancy of a sumptuous manor house through this marriage to this high-born lady. Thus proudly and favorably circumstanced, it was an easy step from this social elevation and financial security to the office of recorder of the city of London.

His one thought and consuming desire was to climb, forever climb, to a higher position in the judiciary of his country. He was finally recommended to the King as a suitable man to serve His Majesty. As a result of these recommendations from his newly acquired social and political friends, he was then promoted to the high office of chief justice of the King's bench, which for a long time had been his paramount ambition to obtain, because it was an advancing rung in the ladder that led to the lord chancellorship. As lord chief justice of England, he was constantly determined upon doing everything within his power to please the King and all the satellites of the King's court in order to attain the ambition of his life. He was content to abide his time and to wade through slaughter, if necessary, for the seat he so much coveted, and he could well afford to go to any extreme, for he was already confirmed—as Judge Holmes has already been confirmed as a district judge—and forever secure as a chief justice of the King's bench. Every sentence he pronounced and every judgment he enrolled were with an eye single to the interest of his political faction and to his own advancement to the lord chancellorship of England.

Judge Jeffreys sought not only to please the King but also to strike terror into the ranks of the opposite political party by the very savagery with which he conducted his prosecutions.

In the case of Sir Thomas Armstrong, a man who did not enjoy the good graces of the King, Judge Jeffreys illegally overruled his plea and then pronounced judgment of death upon him. Sir Thomas exclaimed, "I ought to have the benefit of the law, and I demand no more." Whereupon the infuriated judge replied, "That you shall have, by the grace of God. See that execution shall be done on Friday next according to law."

The King presented to Judge Jeffreys a valuable ring from his own finger in reward for this trial, and it has since been known as Jeffreys' bloodstone.

Just before attaining the goal of his ambition—appointment as Lord Chancellor of England—and during the time of his sojourn in the western circuit where he was sent to try a large number of alleged violators of the law, he learned of the death of the Lord Chancellor to whom he desired to become the successor, and was therefore in great haste to return to London lest some other judge might receive the appointment. Consequently, in order to expedite his departure, he conceived the idea of having it openly proclaimed "that if any of those indicted should relent and plead guilty they would find him to be a merciful judge, but that those who put themselves on trial, if found guilty, would have little time to live, and had better spare him the trouble of trying them."

On the Monday morning thereafter Judge Jeffreys, on taking his place, found many applications to withdraw the plea of not guilty, and the accused pleaded guilty in great numbers—as they do in Judge Holmes' court—but this did not placate the enkindled ire of the judge, and he manifested no semblance of mercy. In these few days 292 of these unfortunates received death sentences, and the whole country was covered with quarters of human beings, and to this day the tradition still lives of the horror then and there created.

Following these numerous summary sentences Judge Jeffreys hastened to London in order to obtain for himself the coveted office of Lord Chancellor of England. By royal command he stopped at Windsor Castle and after a wonderful reception the great seal was delivered into his hands. A short time after this followed the downfall and flight of King James, and Judge Jeffreys was thrown into a state of great consternation. He undertook to effect his escape by disguising himself in the garb of a sailor, but was finally detected by one of his victims, who at one time had been arraigned before his court, and who later, upon being questioned as to how he came off, said, "Came off? I am escaped from the terrors of that man's face, which I would scarcely undergo again to save my life, and I shall certainly have the frightful impression of it as long as I live."

The disguised Lord Chancellor, while seated in an alehouse for breakfast, and believing himself unrecognizable in his sailor suit and old soft hat, dared to put his head out of the window to look at the passers-by, and it so happened that at that very moment this same man was walking upon the opposite side of the street and recalled the features of the pretended sailor as those of none other than Lord Chancellor Jeffreys. Upon forthwith being seized and carried to the Tower of London for safety he lost all sense of dignity and presence of mind, and as the coach rolled along to the great tower he constantly exclaimed, "For the Lord's sake, keep them off! Keep them off!"

While incarcerated in the tower a letter was addressed to him from the widows and fatherless children of the west where he had sentenced so many hundreds of poor unfortunates who had entered pleas of guilty at his request. This letter reads as follows:

We, to the number of a thousand and more widows and fatherless children, our dear husbands and tender fathers having been so treacherously butchered, our estates sold from us, our inheritances cut off by the severe sentences of Lord Judge Jeffreys, now in the Tower of London, a prisoner, ask that the Lord Chancellor, the vilest of men, be brought down to our counties, where we the good women of the west shall be glad to see him and give him another manner of welcome than he had there 3 years since.

And so in the great Tower of London, the Lord Chancellor of England, Judge Jeffreys, died a miserable death at the age of 41. There is not to be found in all judicial history a more striking and impressive example of far-reaching consequences that flow from investing in such characters great power and authority through promotion in the judiciary than in the life of Judge Jeffreys.

To find his counterpart in modern times I have only to direct your attention to the life story and judicial record of Judge Edwin R. Holmes. Judge Holmes began the practice of law early in life, at the age of 21, while Judge Jeffreys began at the age of 18. Like the Lord Chancellor of England, Judge Holmes first sought the hand and heart of the daughter of a country gentleman, a one time United States Senator, realizing, as he must, that this union would forever establish his social status and political allegiance. Like Judge Jeffreys, he realized that through this favorable circumstance his own violent ambition to reach the top rung in the ladder of the judiciary could be best promoted.

His first political office was that of mayor of Yazoo City, this recognition corresponding to the first office held by Judge Jeffreys, which was that of recorder of the city of London.

Because of the prestige and influence of his father-in-law, and because of his improved social status occasioned by his marriage to the daughter of an outstandingly prominent country gentleman, Judge Holmes was elevated to the judgeship in the Federal District Court of the State of Mississippi. Here was an undeserving recognition thrust upon him by virtue of the fact that he was the son-in-law of a United States Senator. Knowing that his promotion came from a political influence, having been reared in a political atmosphere, having been envired by unceasing political activities, his first allegiance when he became a Federal judge was to those interests and that political faction which had secured his appointment. As in the case of Judge Jeffreys, his one consuming desire was to climb, forever climb, to a higher position in the judiciary of his country, and to do so by the exercise of his power to please and further the interest of his political faction, and at the same time to strike terror and consternation into the ranks of the opposite political faction.

Judge Jeffreys had his Sir Thomas Armstrong, whose plea he illegally overruled for political purposes, and for which he received a priceless ring taken from the finger of the King; and Judge Holmes had his ex-Governor THEODORE G. BILBO, whom he illegally sentenced for contempt of his court and incarcerated without authority of law in the Federal jail within his jurisdiction, for political purposes.

Judge Jeffreys urged upon alleged violators of the law in the western circuit, where he had been sent to try several hundred cases, that if they would plead guilty to the charges made against them they would find him to be a merciful judge; but if they put themselves on trial and were found guilty they would have little time to live, and consequently they had better spare him the trouble of trying them. Likewise, Judge Holmes caused it to be frequently stated by attendants in his court to these alleged violators of the National Prohibition Act that if they would come into his court without an attorney and plead guilty he would exercise mercy.

In the instance of Judge Jeffreys, when these alleged violators from the western circuit complied with his proclamation and pleaded guilty, he gave to each and every one of them a sentence of death; and the tradition still lives of the horror then and there created. Likewise, in the case of Judge Holmes, he unlawfully sentenced hundreds and possibly thousands of these alleged violators of the liquor law to years of servitude in a Federal penitentiary, notwithstanding the fact that they had pleaded guilty to an indictment wherein they were charged with mere misdemeanors.

Judge Jeffreys pronounced these severe sentences upon his victims in order to curry favor with his own political faction and to satisfy the bloodthirsty cravings of his majesty the king. Judge Holmes imposed these illegal sentences upon these unfortunate violators of the law because he thought it was a popular thing to do in a prohibition State where the people have never voted to legalize the sale of spirituous liquors.

The masterpiece which was addressed to the authorities by the widows and fatherless children of the West, whose husbands and fathers he had treacherously butchered, would be a fit memorial for the thousands of wives and children in the several Federal court districts of Mississippi to address to the United States Senate at the present hour, when Judge Holmes, the author and perpetrator of the injustices that have been done them, is seeking promotion before this body in the judiciary of this country.

I can well imagine the feelings of delight that must have been experienced by that victim of the wrath of Judge Jeffreys who, when walking over the paved streets of London, beheld and recognized the face of the Lord Chancellor in the worn-out garb of a common sailor. It has been my experience, Mr. President, to have indelibly fixed upon my mind the terrors of Judge Holmes' face, which I would scarce undergo again to save my life, when I stood before him on the morning of April 16, 1923, in the little town of Oxford. Visualize if you will that tragic moment. The courtroom was crowded and overflowing with spectators. The temperature was mounting and at fever heat. A dense humidity had settled down, with suffocating discomforts, and lay heavily like a leaden robe upon an awe-struck assemblage. Men's nerves were strung to the highest tension, strained to that fine ductility that snaps to the sequence of startled expectancy. Their sensibilities were stunned by the terrific outburst of an unanticipated and inconceivable judgment just imposed upon me.

Behold, for the moment, standing before an enraged and unreasonable judge, an ex-Governor of a sovereign State of the Union, a practicing attorney in good repute before the bar of the courts of this country, receiving an unlawful double sentence from this remorseless judge for an alleged contempt of a Federal court; a contempt to which he had not pleaded guilty; a contempt which he had in most polite and deferential language disclaimed any intention to commit; a contempt that grew out of a character of subpena that was wholly void and without potency, as I have this day shown, and had been outlawed by the statutes of the United States for more than 100 years. Behold this man, for the time being, suffering inwardly the unutterable tortures arising from the shame and ignominy that with such explosive suddenness and breathtaking violence had been heaped upon him, calm and self-possessed with it all, meekly and with gentle persuasion most courteously stating all the facts by which he had been motivated; and then listen to that stern and unyielding judge, steeled against all the softer influences and finer sentiments numbered among the nobler attributes of mankind, snapping a snarled and merciless judgment and unlawful sentence with all the venom and viciousness of his poisoned and revengeful nature!

Fortunate, indeed, am I this day to be able to recognize the face and features of this tyrannical judge, not as he protrudes his head from the window of a breakfast inn as I tramp the sidewalks of a populous city but as he advances his claim for promotion in the judiciary of my country while I stand in the presence of the Members of the Senate. I trust that my recognition of his form and features on this occasion, and my portrayal to you of this judge as I know him to be, will result in the termination of his political life, and in your refusal to permit his advancement in accordance with the unbridled ambition that has motivated every act of his judicial life.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the elements that entered into the character of the Lord Chancellor of England are the self-same elements that are embodied in the character of Judge Edwin R. Holmes. The distinction between the severity of the sentences imposed by the two judges does not lie in any appreciable difference in the elements that constitute their respective characters, but exists only by virtue of the times in which they lived and the environments by which they were circumstanced. In other words, if Judge Holmes had lived in the days of King James, he would have been in all essentiality the Lord Chancellor Jeffreys; and if Judge Jeffreys had lived in the days of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, he would have been no worse and no better than Judge Edwin R. Holmes.

Mr. President, with these remarks, and awaiting whatever reply my friends on the opposite side of this question may have to make, I move that the nomination of Judge Holmes be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in order to give me an opportunity to present further evidence in the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] to recommit the nomination.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TAXATION OF BANK SECURITIES OWNED BY THE R. F. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity, which was, on page 2, to strike out section 2 and insert:

SEC. 2. Effective upon the date of enactment of this act, interest charges on all loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to closed banks and trust companies, now in force, or made subsequent to the date of enactment of this act, shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum on condition that the rate of interest charged debtors of such banks or trust companies shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum; otherwise such interest rate shall be as fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Provided, however, That no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize a reduction in the rate of interest on such loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation retroactive from the date of enactment of this act.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. BENSON. I object.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be held on the table temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EDWIN R. HOLMES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Edwin R. Holmes to be United States circuit judge, fifth circuit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] to recommit the nomination to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, it will be my purpose to state very briefly the considerations which, in the first instance, led the subcommittee appointed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and following that the full Committee on the Judiciary, to report, in each case unanimously, in favor of the confirmation of Judge Edwin R. Holmes to be judge of the circuit court for the fifth circuit.

Since it has been charged openly that the protestant, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], has not had the opportunity to make the kind of showing which he desired, and since he has indicated his purpose by moving to recommit on that ground, I think just a moment or two should be taken to lay the facts in that particular before the Senate.

The nomination was sent to the Senate by the President in August of last year. It was reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary. The recommendations submitted in behalf of Judge Holmes appeared to the committee to show abundantly his qualifications for the office to which he had been nominated.

When the nomination had been reported to the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary it was made known by the junior Senator from Mississippi, who was then in his home State participating in a gubernatorial campaign, by communication to the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], that the junior Senator from Mississippi desired to object on personal grounds to the confirmation of the nomination of Judge Holmes. The nomination was then re-committed to the Committee on the Judiciary and the senior Senator from Mississippi appeared before the committee in August, a few days before final adjournment, stated the facts in reference to the personal objection of his colleague, and asked that the matter go over until the next session. It went over; but before adjournment the chairman of the Judiciary Committee presented, and the Senate adopted, a resolution which kept the nomination before the Senate.

I refer to that fact only because it shows that it must have been known to the junior Senator from Mississippi that if he desired to examine into the record of Judge Holmes, and gather his evidence, that was his opportunity to do it. I say it should have been known to him, unless possibly this is another case such as the Senator himself has referred to, when, while he was serving as Governor of Mississippi in 1930, both branches of his legislature unanimously endorsed Judge Holmes for a vacancy then existing on this very circuit court of appeals. The only answer the junior Senator has to make to that—it being remembered that the incident of his confinement to jail, about which he complains, took place in 1923, and the incident to which I now refer took place in 1930—is that he was so busy with the legislature that he did not know about it. It may be that he did not know that this matter was going to be before the Senate at this session; but I think everyone else who had any interest in the matter knew it.

At the opening of this session on the 3d of January there was appointed by the Judiciary Committee a subcommittee composed of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], and myself. We at once conferred with the two Senators from Mississippi in order to get their views on this nominee. The junior Senator from Mississippi indicated that he wished to be heard on the matter. The committee, of course, expressed willingness to hear him, and asked him what witnesses he desired to have called. He stated that he would submit a list of all the witnesses he desired; and after some little delay—not especially unreasonable, I think—the junior Senator did submit the names of certain witnesses whom he desired to have called.

One thing in particular was that he wished to have us issue a subpoena duces tecum to bring in all the records of the court in the case of Birkhead against Russell, which was tried before Judge Holmes in 1922 and 1923. Those records were all brought from Mississippi. A hearing was set for the 23d of January, the complete court records in the matter, at the request of the junior Senator from Mississippi, having been received several days before that and turned over to him for examination.

On the 23d of January the junior Senator stated that if the matter could go over until the 24th he would be able to proceed to better advantage, because he had not completed his examination of the rather voluminous court records in the case. The other members of the committee being consulted, that was agreed to. Following that, on the same day, one of the witnesses to whom the junior Senator has referred—Judge Crum, a witness subpoenaed at the request of the junior Senator from Mississippi—received word, I believe, of illness in his family, and desired to return home immediately; so the committee met that day—on the 23d—and heard this one witness, and then, to accommodate the junior Senator, met on the following day—the 24th.

We subpoenaed whatever witnesses the junior Senator requested, and all the records that he wanted. Judge Holmes himself came here, and a number of attorneys and others appeared voluntarily in the case; and beginning on the 23d, and continuing on the 24th and 25th, we heard all of the evidence. Both sides rested, having offered everything they had to offer, and the subcommittee awaited the preparation of the transcript of the evidence before holding a meeting for a decision.

About a week after the conclusion of the hearings, when, as we all supposed, the matter was completely at an end, and in fact just on the morning of the day when the committee normally would have been ready to report to the Judiciary Committee their findings, to wit, on Monday, the 3d of February, a few minutes before the meeting of the committee the junior Senator from Mississippi delivered to me a written communication in which he asked to have the hearings reopened, as he desired to call some more witnesses and go into other matters.

We complied with his request, and did not make a report; and, with the approval of the other members of the committee, I wrote to the junior Senator from Mississippi and suggested that we thought the matter had been gone into very extensively, emphasizing, as he says I have done on that occasion and on all occasions, that the only matter in which we were interested was the question of the qualifications of this judge to hold the office. Anything that might be said pro or con on that question we were interested in, but nothing else; but I added that if the junior Senator from Mississippi felt that there were other matters bearing on that question which ought to be investigated, we should like to have him submit a list of the names of the witnesses and a brief statement as to what he hoped to prove by them.

The junior Senator from Mississippi agreed to that, but stated that he wished to go to Mississippi to gather some of his evidence; or, I believe, he stated that he was going to Mississippi to make a speech, and that while there he would gather the evidence.

The matter ran on for a few weeks, and after his return he did submit a very long statement of certain additional matters which he desired to have investigated. There really was nothing else about the one matter with which he had started. We had all the evidence on that subject, and it had been submitted in the testimony and in the statements, and has been submitted today in the oral argument of the junior Senator from Mississippi; so it is thoroughly familiar to all Senators who have followed the matter.

But there were some other matters which the Senator wished to have investigated. The first was the matter of certain alleged political activities of Judge Holmes. The second had to do with the so-called illegal sentences; and there were named four men who, it is claimed, back in 1931 or 1932—I believe 1931—had been given sentences for felonies, which I may say in passing, on the sworn testimony, they committed; two of whom, however, were able to secure their discharge on writs of habeas corpus after serving a portion of their sentences, because of what are alleged to have been defects in the indictments. But, in any event, one of the requests was that we go thoroughly into that matter. Also the charge was made that this judge, as United States district judge, had approved the report of the receiver of a closed national bank in Mississippi which had been an improvident settlement, so it was claimed; and the request was made that we subpoena J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency; and at that time and later the request was made that we also subpoena a great number of persons from this city in Mississippi, members of a depositors' committee, attorneys, and others who might know about the various items of the settlement.

I believe there was only one other matter to which our attention was called, and that was in reference to the probation of a man named Searle Hewes, who pleaded guilty to a charge of embezzlement. Judge Holmes, upon hearing the statements of many of his townspeople in reference to the good qualities of this young man, determined that there was a chance to rehabilitate a confessed criminal, and sentenced the man to 3 years in prison but released him on parole.

Those were the matters which we were invited to investigate. While the members of the subcommittee did not think it advisable to call the bootleggers, as I think we may properly denominate them, since they all pleaded guilty to the indictments; while we did not consider it necessary to go into all of those phases, in fairness, we wished to get at all the material evidence.

First, in regard to the charge of Judge Holmes being politically active. The charge was made, and the statement from the junior Senator from Mississippi, in specific language, was that in the campaign of 1928 Senator Hubert D. Stephens, a candidate for reelection, was to speak at a fair somewhere in central Mississippi, his opponent being the then former Representative T. Webber Wilson, and that to this gathering—in the nature of a joint debate, as I understand—Judge Holmes had gone, and that he had taken part in that political meeting. That seemed like a matter that should be investigated, and the junior Senator from Mississippi asked in his first request simply that we call Judge T. Webber Wilson, the candidate against whom the remarks were supposed to have been made and the participation engaged in. But in a later communication he asked that we call not only Judge Wilson but one of his campaign managers—Colonel Wooton.

We endeavored to call both those gentlemen, who are now employed in Washington, but Colonel Wooton had left the city, and gone to Mississippi, and could not be reached at the time; but Judge Wilson, the main one, the one first mentioned, and apparently the most interested party, was here, and we issued a subpoena for him. He came before the committee. I do not know as to the other members of the committee, but when I went into the committee room that was the first time I had ever seen Mr. Wilson. He was sworn as the witness of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], and his testimony is in the printed record. I hope many Senators have read it. He told about this incident, but, instead of giving his testimony, let me read the letter of ex-Senator Stephens on the same point. He also testified, but I think the matter is brought out a little more succinctly in his letter. The testimony of Judge Holmes, of Senator Stephens, and of Judge Wilson, the latter two the candidates, is all identical in this respect.

This is the letter from Senator Stephens:

My attention has been called to a statement filed by Senator T. G. BILBO at the hearing before a subcommittee, of which you are chairman, on the nomination of Judge Edwin R. Holmes. The statement to which I refer is on page 108. It reads as follows:

"Judge Holmes forgot to tell you that when the Honorable T. Webber Wilson, who is now a member of the Federal Parole Board, and was at the time a Member of Congress, was making his race for the United States Senate against the then incumbent, Senator Stephens, he (Judge Holmes) left his home and his court and traveled 150 miles across the State and, as all understood and believed at the time, had himself, by prearrangement, planted in the audience to be called upon by Senator Stephens, so he could stand in the audience and give testimony in behalf of Senator Stephens against Congressman Wilson at the time. Does this look like a man who never took any part in politics?"

I had no knowledge that Judge Holmes was to attend the speaking. There was no prearrangement, nor was he planted in the audience to be called upon by me. It is true that he came quite a distance, but hundreds of others did the same. I saw him shortly before the speaking began, shook hands with him and other friends, but had no idea at that time of making reference to him during my speech.

For many years it had been charged that Federal offices were sold in Mississippi. At the session before the time of the speaking I had been active in having passed through the Senate a bill making the buying or selling of such offices a criminal offense. Certain persons had been indicted in Judge Holmes' court.

I interject here that former Representative Wilson testified that in his meetings in this campaign he had claimed that he, rather than Senator Stephens, was the one responsible for bringing about these indictments, because he had introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution to investigate the matter. Senator Stephens continued:

Because of some remarks made by my opponent I desired to call attention to the fact that I had been instrumental in the passage of the bill referred to. Seeing Judge Holmes in the audience, I asked him to stand up. He did so, and I asked only this question, "If this bill had not been passed, would it have been possible for those persons to be indicted?" His answer was, "No." That ended the matter.

Judge Holmes and I have been friends for many years, but I had never heard of him taking an active part in any campaign of mine. Really, I have never known him to be active in any political campaign since he was appointed judge.

Judge Wilson went into the matter a little more fully and stated, just as Senator Stephens had stated, that when Senator Stephens called on Judge Holmes to stand up he never saw a more embarrassed man in his life the judge apparently not knowing what was going to happen to him. But he stood up, the question was propounded, he said, "No" and sat down, and that was the end of it. Judge Wilson said that not a vote was affected. He may have been a little hurt at the time, but he realized it did not have any effect on the campaign; certainly there was nothing to indicate any political activity on the part of the judge. That is all there was to that story.

Later, at the instance of the junior Senator from Mississippi, we were able to secure the presence of Colonel Wooton, and he came in and elaborated this matter a little more. He remembered that the judge said something more than merely to answer "No." He gave the date of the passage of the act to which Senator Stephens referred, and Colonel Wooton, the campaign manager, said he thought that from that time on he could see that the popularity of his candidate, Wilson, was waning. But it is a little hard for members of the committee to see that Judge Holmes had anything to do with that.

Mr. President, that is the whole story, and that is all there is to the charge of political activity on the part of the judge.

I must hasten, as I do not desire to detain the Senate for more than a few moments. In reference to the matter of the First National Bank of Gulfport, a claim was made, which was not in the mind of the junior Senator from Mississippi when he started to present these objections, but someone down in Mississippi had told him some kind of a story, so eventually he brought in the fact that Judge Holmes had been the one who had approved the report of Receiver A. F. Rawlings both for the sale of the assets and for the composition of claims against persons who owed the bank, and, as I said, he asked that we call in Mr. O'Connor, the Comptroller of the Currency, and a great many persons from Mississippi.

We did talk with the Comptroller of the Currency, who was leaving the city, and who stated that in any event the right person to call, if we desired information in regard to the matter, was the Deputy Comptroller, Mr. Lyons, whose name has been mentioned here, and who is in charge of insolvent banks. So we asked Mr. Lyons to appear, and he came before the committee. We wanted to get information from him, not in reference particularly to any certain items in the bank in Gulfport, Miss., for we assumed that he would not have information as to that in his mind, but we wanted to know what the procedure was in reference to handling closed banks, and how much a judge had to do with it. I will not take the time to read his testimony, except one paragraph, which shows just how the matter is handled. He stated:

In the course of liquidation the bad debts are usually taken care of later on. The good assets are worked on and liquidated, and then they work on the doubtful assets. That is the ordinary course. The receiver negotiates with the debtors and works up the best settlement he can. That is his duty. He has, of course, some of the local people to consult in that connection. Lots of banks have depositors' committees that consult with the receiver on the sale of assets and the compromising of debts.

If he arrives at a settlement that he thinks is fair and the best he can do, he submits that to the office—

Referring to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency—

with all information he has and with his recommendation. Before we approve or disapprove a compromise we, of course, refer to the records of that bank, and quite often the examiner before the bank closed would have classified certain of them as doubtful or worthless. We have that information. We have the receiver's classification at the time he took charge. In addition, we require the financial statements of the debtors, which we analyze, and if the offer seems the best the receiver can get, due to the financial condition of the debtor, we approve and authorize him to petition the court for authority to make the compromise.

That petition is presented by the receiver's attorney, and there is usually attached to it a letter or copy of the letter which we addressed to the receiver approving the settlement. In that letter in the preamble we set out the facts as presented to us by the receiver, the insolvent condition or the extent to which insolvency exists, and the ability of the debtor to pay. The court has that before it at the time the petition is filed. In most cases that goes through the court without any question, because of the complete data which we set out in our letter and our conclusion as to why that settlement should be approved.

The Deputy Comptroller of the Currency goes on to say that Mr. Rawlings, the receiver in the case of this particular bank, was appointed a national-bank receiver in 1926; that he is considered one of the best receivers in the entire system; that all his reports in this case were thoroughly examined, and, of course, the procedure he then outlined was followed. The receiver, through his attorney, presented the matter to Judge Holmes and, no objection being raised by depositors' committees or anyone else, the judge, as a matter of course, approved the report.

We felt that we had gone far enough with the investigation of this closed bank. If we were to begin to examine into the affairs of the bank itself, taking up particular items, it would require doing over again all the work that the Comptroller of the Currency has done, and probably we should not be in a position to arrive at as correct a conclusion as the Comptroller did, that this was the proper way to handle the matter. The system may be wrong. It may be that we should require Federal judges to examine every item of these claims, regardless of the fact that the Comptroller of the Currency has given his approval. That, however, is not the way the matter is handled. So both the subcommittee and the full Committee on the Judiciary felt that there was nothing in the matter of the approval by Judge Holmes of the accounts of the receiver in that bank and his petitions which would in any way militate against the qualifications of this judge.

Another word or two, and I am through.

There has been a great deal of talk this afternoon, as there was before the subcommittee and before the full Committee on the Judiciary which granted the junior Senator from Mississippi the right to appear and make his contentions about four individuals—Jonathan Day, Longmeyer, Neyland, and Ainsworth, and, I believe, one other man. These men all pleaded guilty to violation of the National Prohibition Act. According to the testimony in the record—not only the testimony of the judge but the further and more detailed testimony of the clerk of the court—after their plea of guilty all the witnesses were sworn, not by the judge but by the clerk, as in all Federal courts; and the testimony in each case shows either that much more than a gallon of liquor was involved in the transaction—in certain cases 10 gallons and other amounts—or, if that element were not present, that these confessed offenders were habitual offenders. So the judge imposed sentence in the light of the sworn testimony adduced before him.

It is true that two of the persons I have mentioned, and possibly certain other persons, were later, because of what the circuit court of appeals held were defects in the indictments, able to secure their discharge. These matters were never prosecuted to the Supreme Court. Before that could be done national prohibition had come to the end of the road; and it was never found possible or advisable to have a final decision on the question.

The Senate in all seriousness is asked to disqualify a judge because in his judgment it was sufficient to charge a general violation of the act, and in the judgment of many other United States district judges and in the judgment of the district attorney who prepared the indictment, it was felt that it was sufficient to charge a general violation of the act, and because then upon sworn testimony as to the degree of the offense he sentenced the violators to the penitentiary. We are asked to disqualify this judge because he did not look ahead and see what the circuit court of appeals would decide, which decision might very well have been reversed if the matter had gone to the Supreme Court.

But neither the subcommittee nor the full committee could see any advantage in going further into those matters.

Of course, nothing has happened of the kind indicated by the junior Senator from Mississippi when he talked about thousands and thousands of his constituents who have been illegally sentenced. He presented us with the names of four men. Every one of those men, according to this record, pleaded guilty to the indictments, and, according to the sworn statement, they were all guilty of a felony. They escaped, luckily, from serving their full sentences because other courts held that the indictments should have been more specific. But again I say that there is nothing in this matter which in any way indicates any lack of qualification on the part of the judge.

In closing—I do not wish to detain the Senate longer—let me say that it became very clear to the committee when we began this hearing that there was a sharp difference of opinion between the members of the committee and the junior Senator from Mississippi as to what we were really to investigate in this case. We are somewhat criticized, I understand, by the junior Senator from Mississippi this afternoon for the position we took; but it was our judgment that we were concerned only with the qualifications of the judge and with statements and evidence bearing in some way or other on his qualifications. Apparently it was in the mind of the junior Senator from Mississippi that we should go into the political situation in Mississippi.

The Senator seemed to think that the fact that this judge happened to be a son-in-law of former Senator John Sharp Williams should be considered as having something to do with the question of confirmation, or that we could concern ourselves with the matters in dispute between the Senators from Mississippi. However, we tried to confine the matter closely to the qualifications of the judge. We called every witness suggested that the committee thought could shed any needed light upon the question of the qualification or disqualification of the judge.

We had before us the recommendations of the presidents of the bar associations of Mississippi and Louisiana and communications from a great number of county bar associations unanimously endorsing the judge and speaking of him in the highest degree. The Mississippi Legislature previously had unanimously endorsed him. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen and other organizations spoke most highly of the treatment all litigants received in his court. We were satisfied in the subcommittee, and the full committee is satisfied, that this judge has every qualification for the position to which he is nominated.

So, in closing, we come back to the place where we started. The junior Senator from Mississippi went into this matter with the idea that because the judge had at first sentenced him to 30 days in jail and a hundred dollars' fine, and then reduced the sentence to 10 days, therefore the Senator should make a showing against the judge, at least for the record. I am fully satisfied in my mind that in the beginning that was all the junior Senator had in mind; but later he warmed up to his task. He got into it, and discovered other matters about which he wanted to talk.

Let me now say just a few words in reference to the sentence itself.

Here was a very important case, a salacious case, a case involving the highest political figures in the State of Mississippi. It was a suit by a woman against the then Governor of Mississippi for $100,000 damages for alleged seduction. The suit was brought first, I believe, in the southern district of Mississippi; but the Governor, the defendant in the case, came forward with a plea, if I understand correctly, that while the capital was in the southern district, and he was there, he was maintaining his legal residence in the northern district, and could not properly be sued in the southern district which, I believe, is also the district in which the junior Senator from Mississippi lived.

The suit was dismissed there and filed in the other district. When it came on for trial the junior Senator from Mississippi, at that time a former Lieutenant Governor and former Governor, and having held other offices in his State, was subpoenaed as a witness. It is true that he lives more than 100 miles from the place at which the court was finally held, but unknown to the junior Senator from Mississippi Congress had changed the law in that respect. He said it was changed so few months before this happened that he doubts whether the attorneys in the case and the judge knew the law had been changed.

However, that does not seem to be a matter in which we can indulge in fancy. They did proceed in accordance with the new law. A showing was made to the court upon which the order for a subpoena—not only for the junior Senator from Mississippi but for other witnesses living more than 100 miles from the seat of the trial—was issued. The junior Senator from Mississippi was served with the summons, and he elected not to obey.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. Certainly.

Mr. BILBO. Will the Senator point out for the benefit of the Senate just what act was performed to show that they were complying with the statute as revised?

Mr. BURKE. Without turning specifically to the page, Judge Holmes testified that the attorneys in the case came before him and made the showing. He was asked if there was a written application, and he said it was his impression that there was a written application, although he did not recall definitely, but no written application appears in the files that were brought up.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I refer the Senator to pages 83 and 84 of the hearings of January 24 and 25, where the junior Senator from Mississippi was interrogating Judge Holmes? I quote from the hearings at that point:

Senator BILBO. Without application or cause shown, you issued that order to the clerk?

Judge HOLMES. I think it was a written petition, but I do not find it in the files.

Senator BILBO. It is not in the files.

Judge HOLMES. It is proper for me to act on a written petition. That is my recollection. Mr. Campbell was an experienced lawyer.

Then on page 27 of the plea of Senator THEODORE G. BILBO is set forth the written order made by Judge Holmes, as follows:

To the clerk of the United States District Court of the Western Division of the Northern District at Oxford, Miss.:

You are hereby directed to issue subpoenas for Mrs. C. F. Skillman and Eli Rainer, residents of Memphis, Tenn.; and Theodore G. Bilbo, who resides at Poplarville, Miss.; and Will Perry, Jr., a resident of Meridian, Miss.; and Dr. Henry Boswell, who resides at Magee, Miss.; and E. E. Frantz, of Jackson, Miss., witnesses for the plaintiff in the above-styled case.

Witness my hand this the 20th day of November 1922.

Judge of the United States District Court for the State of Mississippi.

Mr. BURKE. I thank the Senator from Vermont for supplying the definite information in answer to the question.

In any event, the subpoena was issued and served on the junior Senator from Mississippi at his home, and he elected, for reasons which seemed to him sufficient, not to respond to the subpoena.

When the case came on for trial on the 5th of December 1922, it having been announced and generally known that former Governor BILBO was not going to respond to the subpoena, the attorneys for the plaintiff asked for a continuance in order that they might secure a writ of attachment and have the ex-Governor brought into court to testify as a witness. Judge Holmes continued the case until the 9th. The writ of attachment was issued but was returned on the 9th with the notation that ex-Governor BILBO could not be found.

At that time the evidence shows there was discussion between the parties as to whether to proceed with the trial. They thought the trial would last about 10 days, as it did. Some information had come to some of the parties, according in their affidavits, that ex-Governor BILBO had crossed the line into eastern Louisiana. Accordingly, upon application of the attorneys for the plaintiff—and this was testified to before the committee in the presence of the junior Senator from Mississippi—and I find no denial in the record—letters of ex-Governor BILBO were shown to the judge at that time in which ex-Governor BILBO urged Miss Birkhead to bring the action and stated that he would appear as a witness in her behalf whenever the case came on for trial.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURKE. I yield.

Mr. BILBO. Does the Senator mean to state it was shown to the committee that I had written letters to that effect?

Mr. BURKE. I mean to state exactly what I did state; that in the hearing it was developed by the testimony of Judge Holmes himself, as well as by the testimony presented by affidavit to the committee, the affidavit of the attorneys in the case, that such letters were shown to the judge; and the junior Senator from Mississippi was present both when the affidavits were read and when Judge Holmes testified under oath that such was the fact. I find no denial.

Mr. BILBO. I think the Senator is mistaken. There is no such animal as a letter that I had written. There was testimony as to letters the woman in the case had written.

Mr. BURKE. No; these were letters alleged to have been written by ex-Governor BILBO to the woman.

Mr. BILBO. That is merely hearsay, like most of it.

Mr. BURKE. It is not exactly hearsay. It is the testimony of a witness, sworn to tell the truth, who appeared before the committee—Judge Holmes himself.

In any event, a writ of attachment was issued to the marshal in the eastern district of Louisiana and the trial went on, but the marshal made his return that ex-Governor BILBO could not be found any more advantageously in eastern Louisiana than in Mississippi. The jury, after about a 10-day trial, returned a verdict for the defendant.

There are affidavits of the attorneys in the case which indicate that the plaintiff felt, either rightly or wrongly—and we have no way of judging as to that—that if her chief witness, as she claimed, had been present there might very well have been a different outcome, and that was the only complaint anyone had to make about the trial—that one of the witnesses, the witness, did not appear.

Following that incident, the attorneys for the plaintiff asked for a citation of contempt to issue against ex-Governor BILBO. Judge Holmes issued the citation, set it for the next term of court, and in April of 1923, ex-Governor BILBO appeared before the court.

We have heard much argument as to whether or not he pleaded guilty. I have always found, in my experience, that what the parties put down in writing at the time an event happens is apt to be much more accurate and trustworthy than their remembrance of it 10 or 15 years later, particularly when there have been a great many developments that tend to becloud the issue. We find that on this day, whether or not ex-Governor BILBO pleaded guilty, Judge Holmes, at that time, made his entry in the journal that Mr. BILBO entered his plea of guilty, and the judge imposed the sentence.

I, myself, have no difficulty in deciding what happened on that occasion. I think, probably, the Senator from Mississippi is entirely correct in saying that he did not say, "I am guilty"; but, according to my understanding of the law, a man may plead the facts of guilt just as effectively without using the word "guilty" as otherwise. On the Senator's own statement here and before the committee, he said to the judge, "Yes; I received the subpoena, but I did not answer it." That was just as effective a plea of guilty as if he had said, "I am guilty of the charge of contempt."

We were not particularly concerned with the Senator's reasons for not appearing. He says he did not know that the law had been changed. He also says that his testimony was privileged, and would not have been of any help; but, of course, no one can seriously contend that a witness upon whom a subpoena is served may himself decide whether or not his testimony is material.

He must go into court and let the judge determine, in answer to the witness' plea of privilege, whether he must give his testimony.

In any event, the present junior Senator from Mississippi deliberately and wilfully and purposefully disobeyed the subpoena issued out of this court in a most important case; and when he was brought in, in response to the citation issued at the request of the attorneys for the plaintiff who had caused the original subpoena to issue, and made his plea, the judge imposed a sentence.

I do not know that other Senators will agree with me in this; but when the facts in the case were made known to me my estimation of Judge Holmes immediately went to a higher level. Here was a former Governor of the State, a powerful figure in the State, himself a lawyer, a man who anyone could see was going to "go places" in Mississippi politics; a powerful figure. A weak judge would say, "Well, while I might send to jail some unknown man on the street if he deliberately flouted the processes of the court, this man is too powerful. I will let him off." I believe, however, that in this day and age we need to demand that justice shall rule the mighty as well as the weak; and when Judge Holmes imposed a sentence which some might say was too severe, and others might say was not severe enough, I say that imposing any sentence of that kind upon a powerful figure, as he did, was an indication that this judge possesses some of the qualifications that go to make a great member of an important branch of our Government.

It is very interesting to note what followed that. Ex-Governor Bilbo was then taken to the jail, but only nominally was he in jail. The jailer moved out. The jailer asked the judge if it would be proper; he said he would like to move out and let the ex-Governor occupy his rooms on the first floor. The judge made no objection; so ex-Governor Bilbo occupied the rooms of the jailer. He had his telephone. He never was under lock and key. According to the testimony and his own admissions, his place was crowded with visitors all day long.

Three days later the ex-Governor sent for the judge and asked him to drop into the jail and see the ex-Governor, who was then serving the third day of a 30-day sentence; and the sentence also involved the imposition of a $100 fine. The judge testified that he thought it a little unusual that a judge should be asked to go around to the jail to call on a man serving a sentence in the jail; but when he thought of it he decided that a refusal might embarrass the ex-Governor. Anyway, whatever the judge's reasoning was, he went to the jail. A large crowd of students or some other friends of the ex-Governor were visiting with him, but they left; and the judge and the ex-Governor had some conversation.

Again I say, it would be very well to apply to what took place the test of what, if anything, was written down on that occasion. The judge and the Senator disagree as to what was said in the jailer's rooms that day. The judge went back to the courthouse and made an entry in the minutes, that because of the fact that the prisoner had taken his punishment in such a proper manner and had expressed his apologies—I do not recall the exact wording—he thought the ends of justice would be satisfied by reducing the sentence to a 10-day sentence; and it was so ordered.

At the end of 10 days ex-Governor Bilbo appeared at his nominal jail to accept the nomination, as I understand, in the race for Governor that year. I do know, as the testimony clearly shows, that he had a platform composed of 10 planks, one for each day that he served in jail; and enough is shown in the record to indicate very clearly that the Senator took full advantage of capitalizing upon the fact that he had served 10 days in jail rather than testify against a friend.

That is all there is to that. I think, upon a fair consideration of the whole question, that if the Members of the Senate have had an opportunity to read all of the testimony, they have reached the same conclusion that the subcommittee and the full Committee on the Judiciary have reached. If the Members of the Senate had had the opportunity the subcommittee had to sit for 2 days, 3 days, 5 or 6 days with the judge present, to have him on the stand and examine him, to see how he responded to the examination of the junior Senator from Mississippi, and so on, they would agree with the committee that here is a man qualified in every way, by training and experience and temperament, to fill with high honor to himself and to the fifth circuit the position on the circuit court of appeals for the fifth circuit.

So, while it may be that other members of the committee would like to speak, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, I feel that a sufficient showing has been made to justify the Senate in voting down the motion of the junior Senator from Mississippi to recommit the nomination, and in following that action by confirmation of Edwin R. Holmes to be judge of the circuit court for the fifth circuit.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I favor confirmation of this nomination because I became convinced from the evidence, and from personal contact with Judge Holmes in the hearings before the committee, that he is entirely worthy and well qualified for the office.

After the experience of listening, from time to time during a period of 3 years, in connection with the special committee of the Senate investigating receiverships in bankruptcy and in equity, to testimony relating to alleged misconduct of judges, I confess that I probably had a keener interest in this investigation than I otherwise should have had. Viewing the evidence as a whole, and critically, I came to the considered judgment that Judge Holmes is a person who is most likely to hold high the standard of the judiciary, and to do justice to every case, so far as human limitations permit a man to go.

Examining all of the points of challenge made in this investigation, and putting them in their very worst light, they did not seem to me to amount to enough to raise even a question of this man's qualifications for the office.

I do not intend to take the time of the Senate for more than a few moments, but, briefly, the points are: The sentence for contempt; the four or five sentences on November 4, 1931, for violation of the liquor laws; the sentence for larceny, which was suspended; and the charge of participation in a political campaign. These and these alone are the points of objection raised against the confirmation of this nominee.

Take the first one, and look at it in its very worst light. Assume that the judge in this case did not inquire of counsel who applied for the subpoena in the first instance whether there was special cause under the statute for extending the subpoena beyond the 100-mile limit—and, of course, if it was not up to the judge to do that, then he could not be censured for not doing it—but assume that it was up to the judge to investigate his clerk's office and be sure that he knew about all applications made for subpoenas, a circumstance which we know probably very rarely occurs in the offices of the clerks of the district courts; assume that there was the obligation on the judge to do that, and that in this case he failed to do it, that he was negligent and did not ascertain from the counsel whether there were special grounds for extending the subpoena beyond a hundred miles, and that originally there was neglect on the part of this man in the issuing of that one subpoena. Follow that out, and assume further that on the summoning of the junior Senator from Mississippi for contempt, the judge was careless and did not examine the law. I think that is a fair assumption; I think from his testimony that is a fair deduction. His testimony is:

Now, Senator Bilbo's plea of guilty was unexpected. I sentenced him immediately. I did not look at the statute. Most Federal statutes provide a fine and imprisonment. If I had looked at this statute I would have seen that it provided for a fine or imprisonment, but I did not. I frequently sentence without looking at the statute, when I know the sentence I am going to give is small and well within the power of the court. So I entered that sentence of a fine of $100 and 30 days in jail. Senator Bilbo made no objection to the sentence, nor was any appeal requested, nor any statement made by him or any other person that the sentence was unjust, unfair, or improper. Later, by reason of the clemency which I showed the Governor, the error was automatically corrected.

Take it in its very worst light, and this contempt matter is bundled up in a very small compass.

Add to that these other points in testing the qualifications of this man for the office to which he has been nominated, namely, that on November 4, 1931, he sentenced four or five respondents to the penitentiary for violating the liquor law; I do not remember the exact number. If the sentences had been illegal, about which there is a question, add that to the complaint.

Then take the other case, of the exercise of discretion. It is certainly put up to every judge by the laws which Congress has enacted to exercise discretion in criminal cases, and, if he thinks it proper, to suspend sentence and to place the defendants on probation. We, the Congress, have said to the judges, "You must do that in suitable cases."

Here is the judge appealed to for that kind of clemency, and his sympathy is excited. Let us assume there is not a man in the Senate whose sympathy could be excited in the same circumstances. Can we say this man is not qualified to be a judge because we do not agree with him in his discharge of that duty?

Of course, the other point, the allegation that what the judge did at the meeting in Mississippi amounted to participation in a political campaign, is too frivolous for consideration.

I say that, taking all the charges together in their very worst light, assuming that the junior Senator from Mississippi had summoned a thousand more witnesses and that they had all supported everything he claims with respect to these episodes, would they, could they, amount to a cause for supporting his claim that he has good ground for saying to the Senate, "You ought not to confirm this nomination because this man is politically obnoxious to me on these grounds"? I say not.

I desire to go back just far enough to show how little there is to the claim, anyway. Take the charge about which I think more of my colleagues have inquired, knowing that I served on the subcommittee, than about anything else connected with the investigation, the charge that Judge Holmes imposed several illegal sentences under the liquor law. Mr. President, there may be men who think that is so, but the judge thought that he was acting under the law and according to the law, and he had just ground for thinking so. His testimony is as follows:

I was relying and still rely in support of those sentences on the case of Husty v. U. S. (282 U. S. 694, 75 L. Ed. 629).

I will detain the Senate but a moment, but this ought to go into the Record. That case, unanimously decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on February 24, 1931, was clearly in the memory of this judge, and was a full and complete justification of the sentences which he imposed on November 4, 1931. The opinion of the Supreme Court was read for the Court by Mr. Justice Stone, speaking for the entire Court. I read only an extract from it, but certainly enough to show that the sentences in this case were upon proper indictments, according to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the sentences were entirely and wholly lawful.

I read first the following from one of the briefs:

The proviso to the Jones Act defines no new crime, but merely cautions the court to exercise a judicial discretion in the imposition of sentences. Ross v. United States (37 F. (2d) 557, certiorari denied, 281 U. S. 767); United States v. Kent (36 F. (2d) 401. See also McElvogue v. United States, in which this Court denied certiorari.

I read now from page 702 of the decision, just an excerpt from the opinion:

Failure to state more specifically the amount of the liquor, and the time and place of the offenses charged, does not affect the validity of the indictment. It was, at most, ground for a bill of particulars if timely application had been made. See Durland v. United States (161 U. S. 306, 315).

It is urged that the indictment is defective, because it fails to state whether the offenses charged were felonies or misdemeanors, and whether the petitioners were charged with casual or slight violations, or habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law, which, petitioners argue, were made new or aggravated offenses by the Jones Act.

That is exactly what was claimed to be true.

But the Jones Act created no new crime. It increased the penalties for "illegal manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation" (of intoxicating liquor), as defined by section 1, title 2, of the National Prohibition Act, to a fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding 5 years, or both, and added as a proviso, "that it is the intent of Congress that the court, in imposing sentence hereunder, should discriminate between casual or slight violations and habitual sales of intoxicating liquor, or attempts to commercialize violations of the law." As the act added no new criminal offense to those enumerated and defined in the National Prohibition Act, it added nothing to the material allegations required to be set out in indictments for those offenses. The proviso is only a guide to the discretion of the court in imposing the increased sentences for those offenses for which an increased penalty is authorized by the act.

And there are cited several other cases in support of that statement. I omit some language and proceed:

While the district court may have had before it facts other than those appearing of record which it was entitled to consider in imposing sentence under the Jones Act, we think, in view of the confusion which has arisen with respect to the propriety of the sentences under the possession count, that the district court should be afforded an opportunity in its discretion to resentence the petitioners in the view of the applicable statutes, as stated.

That language answers all the criticism made in this case. The judge, after the pleas of guilty, proceeded to inquire of witnesses, who had been sworn before they testified, as to the essential facts connected with the offenses which would determine the degree of the penalty and punishment. Some of the prisoners were taken out of the penitentiary in Georgia on writs of habeas corpus. Why? Because all that appeared to the judge in Georgia was what appeared in the indictment; not a word of testimony such as Judge Holmes had. And in respect to that Judge Holmes said:

Of course, if the case had been presented to me as it was presented to the judge in Georgia, I would have had to do exactly what the judge in Georgia did.

Here is what the clerk of the court, Mr. Todd, testified took place. It is very brief. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] inquired:

What happened after their pleas of guilty?

Mr. Todd. The judge asked the defendant if he had anybody to speak for him. He asked the prohibition agents to come around. You understand, these witnesses are all prohibition agents against the defendant. They are always present in court. He asked them to come around, and they were all sworn, including the defendants. Each defendant, Longmeyer and Neyland, had no statement to make. The prohibition agents testified in open court as to their reputation for selling whisky; that they were old offenders and that they had several and sundry complaints. The judge always asked, "Why did you pick this person out to make the buy from?" The prohibition agents told the court they had various and sundry complaints against these parties for selling whisky, and, based on the complaints, after making an investigation, they made the purchases—

And so on. I shall not undertake to repeat all the testimony; but when we get right down to examination of the evidence before the subcommittee, we find that there is not anything to these charges.

The real situation, as revealed by the evidence, shows in respect to the contempt case that there was contempt. The claim that the subpoena was not valid could not be decided by the man subpoenaed. The only place in our system of government where that question can be answered is in the court. It is not within the power of an attorney, simply because he is an attorney, to hold up his hand against the subpoena and the court and say, "I will not come." Even if the subpoena were invalid, has he that right? It is up to the court to pass on that question.

So far as the punishment for contempt goes, the punishment actually inflicted and suffered was wholly and entirely within the law.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield.

Mr. BILBO. Will the Senator from Vermont say that he would sustain a conviction for contempt if the subpoena were illegal?

Mr. AUSTIN. What I said was that the real situation showed an actual contempt of court in not attending court and making the claim to the court that the subpoena was invalid. As I pointed out, there was not in fact any illegal sentence imposed on the 4th day of November 1931.

With respect to the exercise of clemency, that is not for us to review.

So far as the allegation of participation in politics goes, it is frivolous.

So, with a presentation such as was made in this case, after the very close study of this matter by the Committee on the Judiciary, which was considerate of the point of view of the junior Senator from Mississippi who had made the claim that this man was personally obnoxious to him, I feel sure that the recommendation of the committee, unanimously made upon a vote taken by roll call, is a well-considered recommendation; and my impression is that it is founded upon the evidence, and that this nomination ought to be confirmed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, out of consideration of Senators, because we have been here for a long time, and it is quite late, I am going to forego what I should very much like to say in behalf of the man whose nomination for judge is now before us.

I hope we may have a vote.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer than necessary to keep the record straight.

It makes me very much discouraged, after having tried to read the opinions of the courts, that the Senator did not hear me. I am afraid my friend the Senator from Vermont was not present when I read them. I am astounded at his position, in the face of the statute and in the face of the opinions of the courts which passed upon this important question.

In 1929 the Jones Act was passed. The Husty case, from which the Senator read, was an interpretation of that act and its provisions. In 1931 the Jones Act, which was an amendment to the prohibition act, was itself amended; and it is under the amended Jones Act that all the courts say, except Judge Holmes' court, that indictments must allege those conditions set out in the statute which make an act a felony. My contention is that the judge has the same trouble the Senator has. He is still traveling under the Husty opinion, which interprets the law of 1929, whereas Congress had passed another law; and it seems to me the Senator has had about as much trouble in finding out that Congress had amended the Jones Act as Judge Holmes has had in the disposition of the cases in his court.

There can be no question about the matter. Eight judges have passed on it, as well as two circuit courts of appeal, the tenth and the fifth. Both of the appellate courts say that in order to send a man to the penitentiary for violating the liquor law, the indictment must affirmatively allege the sale or possession of more than a gallon. It must affirmatively state that he has been an habitual violator.

That must be stated. If it is not stated, and then the man pleads guilty to a misdemeanor, the misdemeanor under the amended Jones Act carries with it a penalty of 6 months or $500; and that means 6 months in jail, and not 6 months at hard labor.

I am telling the Senate these matters because of Judge Holmes' misunderstanding and lack of appreciation and inability at interpretation of the statute itself and the decisions of the courts. He is down in a corner of Mississippi where he has sent hundreds, and I might say thousands, of Mississippians to the penitentiary in open defiance of the statute and in open defiance of the decisions of the courts.

It has been suggested that a case has not gone to the Supreme Court of the United States. No; there have not been any lawyers foolish enough to appeal from the arguments and reasonings of the circuit court of appeals in the California case and in the Pace case. It is an open-and-shut proposition. No lawyer has been foolish enough to carry it to the Supreme Court. It is conceded and there seems to be no way to get around it.

If it is the desire of Senators to make a record by confirming this man who has sent and will send hundreds, and I think thousands, of people to the penitentiary when he is violating the law himself, when he is defying the decisions of the courts themselves, it is for Senators to decide for themselves. If Senators desire to confirm a man with that kind of a record, I have nothing further to say. It is their duty and their responsibility. All I ask is to have the nomination go back to the committee, and I will bring the judges and witnesses to whom I have referred. They will not be bootleggers, either, but reliable witnesses to establish the fact that the man is not judicially minded and is not fitted to hold the position to which he has been named.

My people have been sent to the penitentiary—and I do not care whether they are bootleggers or not, they are citizens and come from good families in many cases. Judge Holmes says he is still continuing that practice. It is said there are only four little bootlegger cases involved. I read a certified list showing at least 13 cases from Judge Holmes' court, and that is merely a suggestion of what he has been doing.

Of course, if Senators do not desire to investigate the matter further, I must be content. I have assumed my responsibility and performed my duty as I see it. If it is the desire of the Senate to confirm Judge Holmes, and if the Senate is unwilling to respect the time-honored rule of personal obnoxiousness, then I must accept that ruling, and I shall be disillusioned in that regard if the vote shall be to confirm Judge Holmes in the face of my protest. I have done my duty and made my record. I apologize to the Senate for having taken so much time, but I wanted the record to be made so the world may know what is involved in the question upon which the Senate is about to vote. I shall keep up that showing until the world does know all about it all the way down the line.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO] to recommit the nomination to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou who counteth the numbers of the stars and calleth them all by their names, who covereth the heavens with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, and who drieth up the mighty rivers, bow down to our altar of prayer and let it be precious in Thy sight. O spread the heavens with the serenity of Thy glory. Walk on the troubled waters and let the winds of Thy mercy be wafted over lands and floods. Father of undying love, take to Thine own arms the helpless and the homeless as they wrestle for the daybreak; may they see the King, not in His strength but in His majesty of His goodness; let the hungry be fed, the naked clothed, and the roofless sheltered. We pray that the strong and the fortunate may not be idle nor frivolous under the awful dome of tragedy and death. Beset them with the thoughts of solemnity and gird them with personal responsibility. The Lord God grant that the trappings of wealth, the homes of luxury, and the gardens of pleasure, in these hours of darkness, may be released and clothed with sacrificial service. O give Thine own power to the men as they labor to save life and property from the tossing, turbulent channels of disaster. God bless them. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE INFLUENCE OF CRIME ON THE AMERICAN HOME

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMILLAN], who is absent today, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD an address by the able Director of the Bureau of Investigation, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, entitled "The Influence of Crime on the American Home." On yesterday the gentleman from South Carolina secured the consent of the House to insert this address, but he was not aware of the rule of the joint committee and had not received the estimate of the Public Printer, since the address would consume 2¾ pages of the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this address may be inserted in the RECORD, as requested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert an address by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, delivered at New York City, March 11, 1936, before the Round Table Forum under the auspices of the New York Herald Tribune:

It is a distinct privilege to address the members of this forum. In so doing I feel that your interest in this subject may bring about effective action against what constitutes the most dangerous menace to the happiness and welfare of the American people since our civilization began. Crime has reached a pinnacle of appalling height. It lives next door to us. It rubs elbows with us. Its blood-caked hands touch ours. A lackadaisical attitude now has resulted in a crisis.

No American home is free of this shadow. Aggravated robbery, theft, arson, rape, felonious assault, or murder annually is visited upon 1 of every 16 homes in America. Last year in this supposedly enlightened, advanced, civilized country there was a minimum of 12,000 murders and an estimated total of 1,445,581 major crimes. Thus 1 of every 84 persons in the United States was subjected to injury or death through the workings of this tremendous crime aggregate.

Beyond this there is a constant toll of the rackets; here no home is exempt. The criminal toll is taken upon food and services, and actual physical violence includes the loss of life itself. The American home and every person in it is today in a state of siege.

I hope you will receive these facts not as those of an alarmist, but as the view of a conservative person reporting conservatively upon a most astounding set of terrifying conditions. The crime problem in America is something which should take precedence before any other subject other than that of livelihood itself. Even then it becomes a correlated subject, because it is costing each American citizen a minimum of $120 a year. This is the per-capita tax which must be assessed to pay our annual crime bill, estimated to be more than $15,000,000,000. If the entire cost of crime could be eliminated for 2 years, that saving would pay off our entire national debt. Freedom for 3 years would pay the entire cost of America's share in the World War, plus an enormous bonus. We have lived for years in apathy; crime in its present proportions cannot exist without apathy, and we are paying a total bill of billions for a national lack of vigilance. The result is a direct blow at the safety of the American home.

I hope this forum will realize that it has a distinct and solemn duty. No battle was ever won without leadership. Today there is indeed a crying need for that leadership in the mobilization of every possible defensive and offensive weapon of public opinion, public vigilance, public courage, and public willingness to carry on relentlessly and without surcease a battle to the death against the multitudinous minions of crime. Just so long as there is no highly active opposition to crime in a community, just so long will that community be crime ridden. I need only to point to the dozens of law-enforcement scandals which exist in our American cities today to bring forcibly before you the fact that in spite of all the lip service which is going on about this menace, little, indeed, is being done to actively eradicate it. Newspaper after newspaper comes forth with the details of grand-jury investigations, vice crusades, police inquiries, scandals in prisons, and there, to all intents and purposes, the matter ends. Should a typhoid epidemic descend upon a city, shadowing it with the danger of illness, we would find thousands of volunteers ready and willing to risk their lives in an effort to protect their loved ones against the ravages of this foe. Yet the insidiousness of crime is such that even though a greater danger exists, we find that the average citizen reads his newspaper, sees the black headlines screaming the details of conditions which are as symptomatic in their way as the ravages of the most deadly disease that ever has swept this country. Practically nothing is done about it. So I am telling you now that conditions have reached a place where you can take your choice. You can rise up and fight. You can use some of the fortitude which is supposed to have been granted the American people through the courage which made this country the greatest independent nation of the world. You can gird yourself for a long and difficult fight upon armed forces of crime, which number more than 3,000,000 active participants, and by so doing you can set yourselves free from the dominance of this underworld army. If you do not care to do this, then you can make up your mind to submit to what really amounts to an actual armed invasion of America.

Again, I must insist that I am speaking conservatively. I have said that crime begins at home and that we are doing nothing—comparatively nothing—to protect that home. My proof comes in the fact that 20 percent of our crime is committed by persons not yet old enough to vote, by those not even out of their "teens", by those who often are not even past high-school age and who should still be under the active management and responsibility of the home. Yet we of law enforcement find these children stealing automobiles, we find them committing almost a thousand murders every year, we find that there are tens of thousands of burglaries and larcenies perpetrated by boys and girls who, in any other generation, would have been under the discipline of vigilant parents. This is an undeniable indictment of the American parent of today. In case after case where the youth of America becomes a felon before he is able to become a voter, the story is the same monotonous repetitious collection of facts. There has been a lack of discipline, of watchfulness. I find indulgence in apathy, misbehaviors leading to more serious infractions of home rule and in turn leading to petty and then vicious and deadly infractions of the law. We cannot wholly blame these youths for the crimes they commit. We must go behind these crimes and blame the true perpetrators, the fathers and mothers who so failed in their duty, who were so prone to the amusements of the moment, who, through mental laziness, allowed discipline to relax and their children to go into the world and reap the harvest which they, the parents, really sowed.

Flooding to me every day in the disillusioning business of watching the criminal flood stream by, I see the reports of local officer after local officer; I hear the stories of probation supervisors, of persons engaged in the thankless job of trying to reconstruct the wreckage of American youth. I find courts jammed with youthful defendants and equally crowded with parents and friends of those parents, determined only upon one course—that of getting their boy or girl, as they call it, "out of trouble." I find that they go to any length of political pressure, monetary pressure, business pressure, the pressure of friendship, to restore that boy or girl to the place where he or she really gained the criminal instincts, which was in the indulgence of the home. And it becomes a sad task to oil the machinery of apprehension and detection, thus bringing closer the menace of reformatories and prisons for these children of crime who were brought to the portals of dishonor through the negligence of older persons who should have led them into upright paths.

Until the criminally minded person, the extraordinarily selfish person, the highly egotistical person, the ultragreedy person who wants what he wants and cares not how he gets it can be taught the inexorable lesson that he cannot get away with violating the laws of society without adequate punishment—until that day arrives, just so long will you have a constant menace of serious crime. Crime begins in America today in the cradle, and the greatest influence toward eradicating that sad condition is the hand which rocks the cradle.

I have said before that upon this forum rests a heavy obligation, first of a reconstruction of American viewpoint toward better parental discipline and a greater sense of law abidance beginning in the home. However, that is only the beginning of the problem which lies before you.

It may be of interest to know that only about 1 out of 4 of our criminals is arrested for his misdeeds. It may be of even greater interest to know that when a man commits a crime and starts upon his escape the easiest avenue toward freedom is after he has been apprehended by a law-enforcement agency. Far too many persons escape the clutches of punishment in the courts and after conviction, and, continuing this thought, you should remember that many of the men and women who are today in our penitentiaries are not even given an adequate punishment for the crimes they committed. The greatest mantle of safety in the criminal world is known as "copping a plea." The criminal realizes that he may commit 20 crimes and pay only for one; further, that he, through shrewd attorneys, through the bribing or frightening of witnesses, through the delays of law, through countless statutes which exist for his protection, may be placed in a haggling position with a prosecuting attorney, with the result that he bargains for his punishment.

It is a sad commentary upon our civilization that in the majority of our criminal trials the old definition of justice has been utterly and absolutely lost. I say this because in many of the cases there has been a process which I can liken only to the pushing and jostling of an auction sale, in which the matter of punishment takes a position of a commodity to be traded for and argued over, until at last the man who is guilty of murder comes into court and pleads guilty to assault. I submit that no criminal ever existed who would deliberately walk into court and plead guilty if he were not guilty. It is an absolute certainty that this man would not plead guilty to the full extent of his crime if through any possible means he might receive a lesser punishment. Therefore we have the amazing picture of a group of men aggregating thousands upon thousands a year who, through their very pleas of guilty, make our criminal jurisprudence a matter of disgrace in that they are allowed to confess a lesser crime than that of which they are really guilty. As long as this exists, just so long will the criminal world figure its profits as a businessman would figure the prices received for his merchandise, and just so long will the underworld count upon inadequate punishment as one of the aids in getting away with murder. Speaking of murder, may I place the thought before you that the average time served by prisoners in America for the commission of our most heinous crime, that of taking human life, is less than 4 years behind the walls of prison, a part of which time frequently is served in the position of trusty?

We are supposed to be one nation, one people—then why, I ask you, is the penalty for murder in one State merely that of life imprisonment, which in an aggregate of cases is followed either by parole or pardon within a few years, while in another State the penalty for the same crime is death? Why should the robbery of a store in one State bring about a sentence of 5 years, while in another a man is supposed to serve 20? Why should the hold-up of a bank in one community merit a prison term of from 1 year to life, with parole or some form of clemency usually extended after the first year, while in the neighboring Commonwealth a man may serve away the best years of his life in atonement? Why should there be no uniform laws governing these matters? Why should it be possible for a criminal to break the law and, by merely stepping across a State line, be free from pursuing officers who are hedged about by extradition technicalities when they seek to bring him back for his crime? Why should it be a State offense to sell various forms of narcotics in one part of the United States and no State offense whatever in another portion? Why should criminal jurisprudence be governed by one set of procedure here and another set in a different locality?

These matters are all local ones, and in the local community little attention is paid to them because they are not viewed from a national angle. However, while the citizen may look upon his crime only locally, the criminal views it from the standpoint of the entire United States. He knows where he can rob a bank and pay the slightest penalty. He knows where he can commit a murder and be eligible for clemency within a comparatively few years. He knows where courts are lax. He knows where prisons have, as criminals call it, "low walls that are easy to climb over." He knows where local legislators, seemingly intent upon the protection of the innocent, have written technicality after technicality into the State statutes, until it is almost impossible to convict an enemy of society. He knows where there are "fixers" who will guarantee freedom for the payment of a certain amount of money. He knows where there are politicians so eager for a criminal vote that they will gladly trade the safety of their community for it. He realizes all these highly important conditions because he is in the business of crime, and the only thing which can put him out of that business is for the American people to make it their business to combat crime and all of the filthy, stultifying influences which foster crime. Of those stultifying influences, may I say with utmost emphasis that the most important of all is rotten politics.

Time after time I have talked to honest chiefs of police about matters which are closest to them—the safety and the welfare of their cities. Time after time these men have told me that they are powerless to move against certain protected elements of lawlessness. They have their choice of remaining in office and striving honestly to do their duty to the utmost against such odds or of resigning their job and leaving it to be filled by a purely politically minded appointee of criminally dominated influences. It is to their credit and to the credit of the men who serve under them that the average police officer in this country tries to do his honest duty. To that end, he often faces the danger of politically protected bullets, knowing that when he attempts to arrest some fiendish lawbreaker it is within the realm of possibility that this criminal may shoot him down and be spirited to safety by the political influences which he has paid in one way or another for his protection. The policeman's life indeed today is not a happy one, and the greatest service that can be done by the American citizen is to take the shackles off the policeman and put them where they belong—on the wrists of the crooks.

Here today I ask you again, as molders of public opinion, as persons of influence in your community, to dedicate yourselves to a never-ending campaign toward the divorcement of politics and law enforcement. There is no sane reason why a warden of a prison, a district attorney, a judge, a sheriff, a constable, a policeman, or any other man who chases criminals should live in danger of the bull whip of political retaliation. Yet throughout the length and breadth of America we find that the ward heeler, the district leader, often the gangster himself, is practically immune from arrest or, at least, conviction. Inevitably the concealed but powerful politicians rise in his defense to set him free, sneering at the men who strove to place him behind bars.

As long as immunity from punishment exists in this country, then just that long will you continue to pay your individual crime bill of $120 a year. In these times when there is so much talk of taxes, why, I ask you, do you sit supine; why do you remain resistless against this draining force, which not only takes your money away from you but endangers your happiness, your homes, and your lives?

For the first time in history there is procedure against the forces which operate behind the guns of crime. Not until the Federal Bureau of Investigation began its campaign in such cases as those of the Urschel kidnaping, the kidnaping of Edward Bremer, of St. Paul, and of others, which came about coincidentally with the passage of laws which gave this Bureau the right to proceed in such cases, has there been a united effort to punish the sustaining forces of criminality. In the kidnaping of Mr. Urschel the active number of abductors was three men. However, in solving that crime we found that behind the scenes there existed more than a score of assistants, money changers, hide-out keepers, messengers, contact men, lawyers, aides, and camp followers of various kinds. The Bureau of Investigation not only sent the three main participants to prison for life, but brought about the conviction of a score of members of this gang who made it possible for the kidnaping to take place. A like record was made in the Dillinger case, where seven men who tried to kill our agents met with death and where a total of 26 followers—gun molls, hide-out owners, and others—were sentenced to prison.

In the Bremer case and others, the same procedure was followed and this was possible because the Federal Bureau of Investigation was entirely free from politics and was backed by laws with teeth in them. Free from the stultifying influences of politics, these men have pointed a way. They have shown what can be done when a body of men of fine character, properly trained in scientific investigation, backed by the proper laws, and given proper equipment are allowed to proceed upon a determined course for the welfare of this country. To that end, I point proudly to the record of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which shows that 94 out of every 100 persons whom it takes into the courtroom for trial finds that there is only one exit, and that is one which leads to prison. May I add that for every dollar expended in making the Federal law a respected and feared thing, our Bureau has been able to return to the American taxpayer $8 in savings and recoveries.

At this time I wish to express my gratitude to the fine and loyal law-enforcement officers of America who have given us their cooperation in Federal cases, and again it might be wise to ask in your home town why local officers can work so well when they are protected by the proximity of Federal officers and why so many strange influences seem to hamper their steps when the case is purely a local one. Do not construe this as a criticism upon your officers. They would be most happy to have this mystery solved and these strange forces lifted from them—forces, I might add, which are like the old man of the sea, riding their shoulders, weighing them down, slowing their steps when they begin the pursuit of protected racketeering and protected crime. Crime in the aggregate cannot exist without either malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. The fault is not that of the man on the job, but the fault of the man who owns that job, the man who can appoint a person to fill that job, and likewise take the job away from him.

I spoke a moment ago about the cooperation of the officer. How about the cooperation of the citizen? Where is it? How often do cases fall because there is no cooperation whatever on the part of the person who should give the greatest of all cooperation, the person who looks to the law-enforcement officer for the protection of his home and his happiness? What do we find in the trial of an average case? First of all, there is the man who doesn't want to go on the jury, a man who regards his business as of greater importance than that of protecting his home. Secondly, we find that there may be a dozen witnesses for the defendant, against one witness for the State. Some citizens are apathetic. More are frankly afraid. Cowards, to put it bluntly. Others can be reached through friendship or political domination to an extent where they actually will go on the witness stand and perjure themselves for the freedom of a man they know to be guilty. All this time they too are paying the per capita tax bill of $120 a year for crime. Is this not an utterly amazing situation? And is it not your duty to campaign relentlessly for better conditions in our juries, for more courage on the part of our citizens in testifying in criminal cases, and for greater insistence that the laws of our country are not only made more uniform, but are made laws for the protection of America instead of laws for the protection of the criminals?

A visit to almost any State capital will find some lawyer legislator spouting mawkish sentimentalities about the protection of the innocent. The percentage of innocent men who are sent to prison is so negligible as to be almost nonexistent. The thought in a cloak used by shyster lawyers in a concerted effort to defeat justice. If any innocent man is convicted in America, there are thousands of guilty ones who get away. The blame rests at the door of a well-named group of men—the lawyers-criminal. The Federal Bureau of Investigation has dedicated itself to sending such legal lawbreakers to prison, and has been successful in a number of outstanding cases, only to find that often in the community where these vultures existed, they were looked upon by the citizens as extremely shrewd and clever men. I submit that there is nothing clever in crime. I submit that it is sordid and that there is something sordid in the mind of the person who can find anything to emulate, or anything to applaud, in the vulturelike activities of such individuals.

The home, the church, and the school must be united upon a common purpose. We cannot correct existing conditions by apathy, by indifference, by supine submission to the dominance of criminally bloodstained influences. We cannot eradicate the outrages of arson, robbery, and murder by a gasp of astonishment when we read the headlines. There is only one way to fight, and that is to get out on the battle line and do something. We must insist upon law-enforcement agencies which are unshackled, which can arrest a criminal and make that arrest stick, which are composed of men properly trained for the jobs they occupy. It is one thing to put a uniform on a brawny body, and it is another thing to give authority to a properly trained brain. The time has definitely come when law enforcement, in all its branches, must be built into a career. The time also has arrived when to select the right person for the right job, a sum of money commensurate with the brains needed shall be paid for that job. Astonishment over the fact that some thousand-dollar-a-year jaller has taken a bribe to allow a super-criminal to escape should be changed to greater astonishment that a civilized Nation should be trusting job holders who can be paid only a thousand dollars a year for the task of keeping our "mad dogs" in check. This, in a greater or lesser degree, is applicable to every position and item of law enforcement.

Now I come to the most important matter in our tangle of criminality—that of sentimentalism and clemency. You who sit on the side lines often applaud when some hardened criminal, perhaps up for his fourth or fifth conviction, is severely lectured in court and given, we'll say, a 15-year sentence. You sit back, secure in your ignorance, believing that you will be safe for 15 years from this menace to society. That sentence has been a legal falsehood. Through the utterly amazing workings of our convict-loving parole lawyers, it is possible for that man to return to his life of crime in as short a time as 12 months. There have been actual cases where local judges have made political capital of the fact that they were sentencing men to long terms in prison, when, in truth, agreements had been made with defense attorneys whereby the sentencing jurist would sign a parole petition after a servitude of only 1 or 2 years. I state this so that you may make it your business to learn just what happens to the criminals who go through the courts in your communities, and ascertain for yourselves how much time they actually serve.

I hasten to add, however, that I am an active advocate of the principle of parole. I said the principle, not the present practices which exist in the administration of parole in many of our States. Certainly every possible endeavor should be made to rehabilitate the person who has offended for the first time against our laws. Crime cannot be cured by inhumanity. A casual of crime cannot be remolded into a worthy member of society by a punishment which leaves him embittered. The first offender should be charged as a first offender, with a commensurate sentence, with commensurate treatment, and commensurate efforts to restore him to the place he lost in society. But who is the first offender? It happens that in the perplexity of our laws, in the mass of technical barricades thrown up by lawyer legislators, either directly concerned with the defense of criminals or associated through friendship or otherwise with those who make their living by defense of criminals, it is almost an impossibility to define the first offender from the old and hardened one.

In some States it is possible for a felon to be listed as a first offender after a criminal history which shows him to have been a repeated inmate of correctional schools and reformatories and after having been repeatedly sentenced to jail and even to city prisons, industrial reformatories, and other institutions of this type. He may have started as a youth by committing a serious crime, which, because he was a youth, became a matter of record only as juvenile delinquency. He may have robbed and stolen for years and, through the technicalities of law, have been saved from penitentiary punishment. He may have committed a score of offenses against our laws, followed by a score of appearances in court. Yet, under our statutes, that man must be looked upon in the same light as the desperate, otherwise law-abiding citizen, who, faced by hunger, steals for the first time in his life.

As for the rotten practice of the fine theory of parole, I have said before, and I say again, that it is a national disgrace. Hardened criminals are being turned forth in many of our States under a multiplicity of laws which is utterly astounding. There are States which employ not more than one man to watch after and supposedly oversee the activity of thousands of roving criminals, many of whom have obtained their freedom through political affiliations. There are other States where prisoners merely report by letter. Do you suppose they confess every infraction they have committed? If you ever have seen a merchant who advertised that he sold inferior goods, that he cheated his customers, that he was dishonest in his trade practices, then I will grant that somewhere there is a criminal who willingly wrote to a parole board that he was again engaging in thievery, burglary, and murder.

Until recently, the matter of parole has been the domain of the sentimentalist and the sob sister. It is easy to weep over the fact that a man has been placed behind bars. It is easy, indeed, to shed a tear when one thinks of the fact that he is separated from his freedom and from those he loves. It is not so easy to remember the mangled, shapeless, horribly sprawled form of a murder victim upon the floor, beaten to death by the muscular hands of this very same criminal. Why do not the sob sister and the sentimentalist give some attention to the victims of crime instead of to the perpetrators of crime? Until this attitude is changed America remains in grave danger.

At the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington there exists a single fingerprint section devoted to the 12,610 men and women who are viewed by our Bureau as the most dangerous and deadly of the army of over 3,000,000 persons whose fingerprint records are on file. These are the kidnapers, who steal from the American home that which is loved best. These are the bank robbers who, with machine guns and superautomatic pistols, descend upon the depositories of this Nation's funds. These are the cowardly individuals who, firing from ambush, send dum-dum bullets into the backs of our law-enforcement officers. These are the gangsters who, operating under the protection of filthy vote buyers, shoot down our citizens and loot our homes. Here are enough dangerous men and women to almost form a complete army division upon a field of battle. To move against them, special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation must be equipped with automatic shotguns, rifles and pistols, machine guns, armored cars, tear gas, and steel breastplates.

I hope I have painted a sufficiently ghastly picture of this super-army of criminality. I hope you will remember every word of it and that you will not forget the most important fact of all—the records show that 3,576 members of this desperate criminal group have at some time felt the angelic mercy of parole, or probation, or pardon, or some other form of sob-sister clemency. Not only has the mantle of sentimentality, or worse, descended once but in some cases many times. Often these dangerous criminals have been arrested for new crimes before law-enforcement officials have been informed that prison gates had been thrown open from a previous sentence which they were supposed to be serving. That, in a nutshell, is the story of a national disgrace which has been brought about by this country's debauchery of sentimentalism and clemency. I sincerely hope you will not and cannot forget it.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes on the Pittsburgh situation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize anyone to request permission to address the House until the special orders for today are disposed of. The Chair will state to the House that it is exceedingly important, as the Chair is informed, that some action be taken on the pending bill today because of a limitation of time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after disposition of the special orders.

GROVER CLEVELAND

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address by George Henry Payne, Federal Communications Commissioner.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how often does Mr. Payne have to have an address put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, I am not able to answer that—

Mr. SNELL. I am willing he should have one in the RECORD occasionally, but I do not think it is necessary for him to have one there every week of the year.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not think there has been one in the RECORD for a month.

Mr. SNELL. Has it been a month? I withdraw the objection, then, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BOYLAN. Furthermore, the address is about a distinguished Republican, Mr. Theodore Roosevelt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by George Henry Payne, Federal Communications Commissioner, over the network of the National Broadcasting Co., on March 18, 1936:

Somewhere Ralph Waldo Emerson has said that when we come to examine the lives of some of the world's great men we are struck by the fact that their accomplishment seems small compared to their reputation. He draws the conclusion that it is the character of great men as much as, and sometimes even more than, their accomplishments that makes them great.

This certainly is true of Grover Cleveland, who stands out as one of the three great Presidents of the half century following the Civil War—the other two being Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson. All three men were powerful and aggressive; all three carried out, against bitter criticism and antagonism, great and important undertakings, but all three loom large in perspective because of the greatness of their characters.

Strangely different, as Cleveland, Roosevelt, and Wilson were in character, education, political principles, and personality, they were as one in greater characteristics—force and aggressiveness and, above all, moral courage.

Surely any member of any party or any faction should welcome the opportunity to honor Cleveland, who, of the three, had the less advantage both as to education and opportunity, and yet rose to be the peer of the scholarly Wilson and the versatile and brilliant Roosevelt. At that he was the first of the three to point the way to political reforms that were scandalously necessary. Realist that he was, stubborn and oftentimes an unhappy realist, he represented the romance of our American life in his rise from humble surroundings to the greatest position and power—the "endless adventure"—as the author Oliver has called it—"the endless adventure of governing men."

Conservative as well as progressive can honor him today for, while he took strong positions, made fierce enemies, and fought aggressively, his honesty was never questioned nor his devotion to the people—the plain people from whom he came.

As one of his biographers has said, his words in praise of the great American, Carl Schurz, accurately described his own attitude toward public life.

"What our Nation needs—and sorely needs", Cleveland said, "is more patriotism that is born of moral courage—the courage that attacks abuses and struggles for civic reforms, single-handed, without counting opposing numbers or measuring opposing forces."

This moral courage he had in an unwonted degree, together with a sturdiness that led him to be misunderstood and to accept sadly that misunderstanding.

Several years ago Dr. John F. Erdmann, one of America's greatest surgeons, told me how, when he was the assistant to Dr. Joseph D. Bryant, the great surgeon of his day, Mr. Cleveland slipped away from Washington to go on board a friend's yacht and there have performed on him a most dangerous and excruciating operation without an anesthetic.

For reasons of state, he felt that this critical moment in his life should be concealed from the public, and throughout the country his enemies hurled insults and threats at him because it was popularly believed that he had gone off on a fishing trip at the time of a great crisis.

The story of his courage and patience and fortitude as told by Dr. Erdmann is one that I hope may some day be made public. Not until long after was it known that he was suffering in silence as he did so often—as he did so nobly.

It is natural that those who reread the life of Cleveland will try to see in his handling of various problems some suggestion for a solution of the problems of our day. This, of course, is the real reason for reading or studying history. It is George Santayana, I believe, who said that history was philosophy in action and, in turn, that that philosophy is soundest and most practical which is based on a distinguished and lofty study of history.

However, it will not be by his particular course under particular circumstances, but by his approach to the problems of his day that we will get the most inspiration.

Years after he had been President he described his early struggles and the characteristics that he believed had led to his rise from poverty to the Presidency. Speaking of his youth, he said that when he found he could not get a college training he "quite cheerfully set about finding any kind of honest work." Adversity, he declared, meant nothing to him; better suffer in adversity than be dishonest. And once having taken that course, he states of himself, he "actually enjoyed his adversities."

RESTORATION OF NATIONAL FARM LOAN ASSOCIATIONS AND FEDERAL LAND BANKS TO FARMER-COOPERATIVE CONTROL

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP] for 10 minutes.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I am very conscious of my obligations as well as a desire to yield to my fellow Congressmen for questions and perhaps for a more detailed explanation on my subject, but as the time allotted to me is very limited I trust you will allow me to continue without these requests. I might add that this bill I am explaining this morning will be heard before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency next Wednesday, and we hope to have it before the Agricultural Committee of the House within a few days and that we will be able to have it on the floor within the very near future, when, of course, ample time will be afforded for full discussion.

My case or subject this afternoon is the Restoration of National Farm Loan Associations and Federal Land Banks to Farmer Cooperative Control. I refer to the bill (H. R. 11502, introduced by me on February 27, which is a companion bill of Senate bill 4003, introduced by Senator CAREY, of Wyoming, and effects the following changes in the Farm Credit Administration:

First. Substitutes for the present supervisory authority, the Governor, a board of five members of which the Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex-officio chairman.

The four members to be appointed by the President shall be designated as Land Bank Commissioner, Intermediate Credit Commissioner, Production Credit Commissioner, and Cooperative Bank Commissioner, not more than two of whom shall be appointed from one political party. The President designates one of the members as vice chairman, who shall be the active executive officer of the Board. Term of office, 5 years.

Second. Provides that national farm loan associations shall elect four of the seven directors of each Federal land bank and the Farm Credit Administration Board appoints three—whereas now the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration appoints four, national farm loan associations elect one, production credit associations elect one, and borrowers from banks for cooperatives elect one. Directors must be actual residents of the district or division for which appointed or elected and must have been residents for 2 years.

Third. Provides for a credit agency board of five members in each Federal land-bank district, three of said members to be appointed by the Farm Credit Administration Board, one to be elected by Production Credit Associations, and one to be elected by borrowers from banks for cooperatives.

This board will exercise supervision and control over all credit agencies under the Farm Credit Administration in each district except the Federal land banks, and they shall be ex officio the director of the Federal Intermediate Credit Bank, the Production Credit Corporation, and the Bank for Cooperatives.

Fourth. The management of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation shall be vested in the Farm Credit Administration Board.

These amendments are all essential to the fundamental purposes of this bill—to restore the cooperative principles of the Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916.

This act of the first Wilson administration followed the study of European credit systems by the American commission in 1913, in which the two essential cooperative features prevailed—farmer ownership and farmer control. The act of 1916 was finally drafted by a joint committee on rural credits and the House and Senate Banking and Currency Committees, composed of the following Senators and Representatives:

Joint committee on rural credits: Carter Glass, Virginia, chairman; Robert L. Owen, Oklahoma; Henry F. Hollis, New Hampshire; Thomas P. Gore, Oklahoma; Hoke Smith, Georgia; Knute Nelson, Minnesota; James H. Brady, Idaho; Michael F. Phelan, Massachusetts; Asbury F. Lever, South Carolina; Ralph W. Moss, Indiana; Everis A. Hayes, California; and Willis C. Hawley, Oregon.

Total, 12.

Senate Committee on Banking and Currency: Robert L. Owen, Oklahoma, chairman; G. M. Hitchcock, Nebraska; James A. Reed, Missouri; Atlee Pomerene, Ohio; John F. Shafroth, Colorado; Henry F. Hollis, New Hampshire; Blair Lee, Maryland; Paul O. Husting, Wisconsin; Duncan U. Fletcher, Florida; Knute Nelson, Minnesota; George P. McLean, Connecticut; John W. Weeks, Massachusetts; Carroll S. Page, Vermont; Asle J. Gronna, North Dakota; George W. Norris, Nebraska.

Total, 15.

House Committee on Banking and Currency: Carter Glass, Virginia, chairman; Thomas G. Patten, New York; C. U. Stone, Illinois; Michael F. Phelan, Massachusetts; Joe H. Eagle, Texas; Otis Wingo, Arkansas; Emmett Wilson, Florida; Ralph W. Moss, Indiana; T. F. Konop, Wisconsin; W. W. Hastings, Oklahoma; Jouett Shouse, Kansas; H. B. Steagall, Alabama; Everis A. Hayes, California; F. E. Guernsey, Maine; F. P. Woods, Iowa; Edmund Platt, New York; George R. Smith, Minnesota; Charles A. Lindbergh, Minnesota; A. L. Keister, Pennsylvania; L. T. McFadden, Pennsylvania.

Twenty. Forty-seven in all.

That act has always been referred to as among the best examples of legislation—clear, concise, complete. For 17 years it remained unchanged in its fundamentals. It was accepted by American agriculture as our first national effort in cooperative credit. It succeeded beyond the fondest hopes of its sponsors.

The Government provided an initial capital of only $750,000 for each of the 12 Federal land banks, or a total of $9,000,000. By 1932 this had all been repaid by the borrowers who subscribed for 5 percent of their loans in stock except $50,000. Bonds secured by farmers' mortgages furnished the funds for loans to about 400,000 farmers through 4,500 national farm-loan associations amounting to $1,200,000,000.

These borrowers entered into contracts under the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act, under which, as stockholders of national farm-loan associations, which purchased an equal amount of stock in the Federal land banks, they were granted control of their local associations and the Federal land banks were to be managed by executives chosen by board of directors, a majority of whom were elected by such national farm-loan associations.

The Federal Farm Loan Board was made nonpartisan by the provision that no more than half the members could be chosen from one political party.

The Farm Credit Act of 1933 and the administrative acts subsequent thereto have changed this situation.

Yet Mr. Morgenthau, then Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, recognizing the contractual rights of the farmer stockholders and their proper jealous regard for the cooperative principles upon which the system had been founded and developed, made the following public statement July 2, 1933:

The institution which we hope to build through the Farm Credit Administration should be farmer-owned and farmer-managed. It should be a decentralized system, locally controlled, with a minimum of Federal supervision.

Have these principles been maintained? The act of 1933 abolished the Federal Farm Loan Board and vested complete control of the system in one man, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration.

Thus the nonpartisan-board provision, under which the Presidents from 1916 until 1933 had selected members geographically representative of the various and diverse agricultural interests of the whole Nation, was abolished.

Now, 5,000 national farm-loan associations, with 650,000 farmer-borrower stockholders, owning $110,000,000 of Federal land-bank stock, elect only one director out of seven. The production credit association and borrowers from banks for cooperatives, which own no stock in the Federal land banks, each elect one. Surely this is exceptional in corporation law, and is particularly objectionable in an institution which has been built upon the principle of cooperative management. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration appoints four directors. This gives him complete control of every Federal land bank. To make this control doubly sure, he has created the office of general agent in each land-bank district, an office not mentioned in the act of 1933 or any other legislation. He is the personal representative of the Governor. He and his staff dominate each bank, control the selection of officials and employees, and determine the bank policies to the minutest detail, if the Governor so wills.

Thus the cooperative principles of the Federal Farm Loan Act have been thrown overboard, and the farmer stockholders' rights have been violated, that supreme, autocratic control may be vested in Washington.

Not only has general supervisory control at Washington been taken away from a nationally representative nonpartisan board, not only have the Federal land banks been divested of all authority, but the national farm-loan associations, the heart of all the farm-loan system, have witnessed the destruction of their legal rights as cooperative stockholders.

They have been forced to adopt resolutions committing to Federal land banks full power over all questions of local management. They cannot choose a secretary-treasurer unless that man is approved by the Federal land bank. Though the Federal land bank makes a gross annual profit of 1 percent on all loans, the associations will not be permitted funds for ordinary operating expenses if in the selection of their officials or in their policies they fail to meet the approval of the bank. An association with $5,000,000 in loans gives the bank a gross profit of $50,000 annually. That is a sizable bank with $250,000 capital, but it can do nothing in protecting its interests on the loans it has endorsed, nor have any of the usual powers of stockholders and directors of a country bank. Outside attorneys handle the foreclosures, instituted without the consent of the association. Farms taken over are managed by nonresidents. Field men, planners, economists, graph and chart experts determine all the policies of the banks and the associations. The farmer stockholders have been left only one of the usual attributes of stock ownership—they pay the bills. There never will be any more dividends—the farmers will never be on the receiving end until the system is restored to practical, experienced executives.

I have copies of these contracts which have been imposed upon the national farm-loan associations. I commend them to your study as examples of the most unique and arbitrary unilateral contracts I have ever read.

The farmer borrowers are being regimented, and that, too, despite their capital investment. If the Government wishes to assume complete control of the farm-loan system, it should buy and retire the stock the farmers purchased under the representation that it carries the usual attributes of stock ownership.

What excuses are offered for this illegal and immoral destruction of our great cooperative credit system?—two:

First. That there was an agricultural emergency in 1933.

Second. That the Government has invested an additional $125,000,000 in the capital stock of the Federal land banks; that it has furnished about $100,000,000 for banks' surplus on account of the moratorium on principal payments; and that the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation has purchased about $750,000,000 of Federal land-bank bonds.

The answer to the first excuse is that the banks and national farm-loan associations were from 1917 to 1933 manned by officials with years of experience in the system and with demonstrated capacity to handle the problem created by the emergency. Only one thing was lacking—adequate loanable funds. Congress supplied these. Had they been administered by these trained officials much of the waste and confusion would have been avoided.

There was set up in Washington a great group of theorists and planners. The St. Louis Federal Land Bank was nominated as the "guinea pig" to try out a lot of textbook theories about the farm-credit business. Then they swooped down on the other banks; abolished established and successful business practices. Recent eastern college graduates in farm economics, without any practical business experience, armed with Washington authority, supplanted the farm-loan executives, who, so far as real authority was concerned, became mere figureheads. The price of a reasonable degree of intelligent independence in protecting their institution against foolish, wasteful methods was a forced resignation—as too many former executives will testify to their sorrow.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska be allowed to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. Not content with running the farm-mortgage business, the planners have had a perfect field day in Washington and in the banks in testing out all their pet theories in farm economics and in duplicating much of the work of county agents and agricultural colleges. Bureaucracy has fastened itself upon the farm-loan system and it will not voluntarily loose its strangle hold. The farmers must carry the burden. Dividends and credits for stock subscriptions upon payment of their loans will be restored only when these expenses of waste and extravagance are paid in full. The farms of America, not the Government, will ultimately bear this burden.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BINDERUP. I should prefer very much if the gentleman would let me continue, and at the conclusion of my remarks I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

The emergency called, not for waste and theory, but for practical economy by the men who had demonstrated their fitness to run the banks.

Now, as to the financial excuses for this unwarranted destruction of the rights of farmer borrowers.

The $125,000,000 additional Government subscription to the capital stock of the land banks was made in January 1932. No attempt was then made to extend the Government control over the land banks and national farm-loan associations. The Government has not demonstrated in this or any other administration that it can operate as efficiently and economically through Washington bureaus as through trained business executives. Surely the Government can continue to entrust its funds to a cooperative credit organization of such demonstrated capacity as the Federal land-bank system. Then, too, this additional stock subscription is being retired, as the law requires, from the stock purchases of farmer borrowers who subscribe 5 percent of the amount of their loan.

As to the $100,000,000 advanced for surplus, this will be repaid by banks having a gross earning capacity in excess of $20,000,000 annually. And the repayment to the Government will be speeded if the heavy hand of bureaucracy is taken off the system.

As to the purchase of land-bank bonds by the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, it can relieve itself of this burden whenever it chooses, for most of the Federal land-bank bonds it has taken over bear a 4-percent rate. Four-percent Federal land-bank bonds of various issues, without any sort of Government guaranty, are now selling on the open market at from five to eight points premium. Please note the daily quotations in any newspaper. The Government can dispose of these bonds at a great profit.

If the Government chooses to hold these bonds, it will continue to realize a nice profit for its Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds bearing rates ranging from 1½ to 3¼ percent. I think we should ask the Farm Credit Administration to furnish a statement of the profit it has made on all Federal land-bank bonds to date. This will demonstrate that the Government has not sacrificed anything in these bond transactions.

Perhaps there are some farmers who are not concerned over the loss of their rights as stockholders, the taking away of local control of their land banks, these bond transactions, and the great delegations of Government field men, planners, economists, and farm managers maintained at their expense. They are so practical that they are willing to forgive all these things if on a cold-blooded money basis it can be demonstrated that this new order of things saved them money, first, as general taxpayers, for most of the expense of the Washington bureau is paid out of the United States Treasury, and, second, as stockholders in associations which in turn own stock in their district Federal land banks.

So let us look at the financial record of the farm-loan system under Washington bureaucratic control.

The administrative expenses, by fiscal years, of the Farm Loan Bureau, beginning with 1923, when the intermediate-credit system was added to the Federal farm-loan system:

1924	354,374.46
1925	373,795.68
1926	441,845.84
1927	585,051.57
1928	740,786.33
1929	899,036.28
1930	954,302.23
1931	1,016,500.00
1932	990,940.00
July 1, 1932, to May 26, 1933	700,031.68

Farm Credit Administration:

1933	$8,347,640.00
1934	8,248,375.00
1935	9,954,884.00

The Farm Credit Administration seeks to justify this enormous increase in expenditures by the sweeping declaration that the increase in business is responsible, pointing out the other agencies which have been brought under its supervision. It also calls attention to the fact that only $345,934.52 was in 1935 charged to the Federal land banks. Admittedly these conditions justified a substantial increase, but this increase should be judged by what part thereof was necessary and what part is attributable to impractical and theoretical bureaucratic expansion.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for another 5 minutes and I would like to interrogate the gentleman if he will yield to me.

Mr. BINDERUP. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman want 5 minutes more to conclude his remarks or does he desire to have 5 minutes to yield for questions?

Mr. BINDERUP. I would like very much to have the 5 minutes to conclude my remarks.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Very well; conclude your remarks first, and then I shall ask the gentleman to yield.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. Federal land-bank borrowers while not affected as stockholders by the other Washington bureau expenses, are, as citizens and taxpayers, interested in an efficient and economical administration of national affairs. An example of this waste and disregard of the practical realities of the national agricultural credit situation is evident in the setting up of 1 central and 12 district banks for cooperatives, for which the Government has already furnished $140,000,000 of capital, though outstanding loans, many of which were taken from the business of the intermediate credit banks, on December 31, 1935, totaled only $50,013,329. By a simple amendment to the Intermediate Credit Act all those loans could have been taken care of with little additional expense. A record of loans outstanding of only about one-third the capital invested after two and a half years of operation is unique in American banking. But interest on Government capital is helpful in paying the high salaries and expenses of 13 unnecessary banks.

But that is beside the question. We are concerned only with the Federal land-bank stockholders who are called upon to bear this last-mentioned burden only as general taxpayers. Matters of this character, however, help to explain the foolish extravagance in the farm-loan system where Federal land-bank stockholders are directly concerned.

Another example of bureaucratic blundering at the expense of farmer stockholders was its failure to call \$185,217,140 worth of 4½ Federal land-bank bonds on May 1, 1935. These bonds could have been refunded with an issue of 3¼-percent bonds, which would have effected an annual interest saving of over \$2,300,000. On April 8, other Federal land-bank $3\frac{1}{4}$ -percent bonds were sold to refund other issues callable May 1. The New York Times of April 9, 1935, on page 31, quoted Charles R. Dunn, fiscal agent for the Federal land banks, to the effect that on the issues marketed on April 8 cash subscriptions of \$500,000,000 were received, which was some \$240,000,000 above the bonds offered, ample to refund the \$185,000,000 issue. The issue sold on April 8 is now quoted at 102.

On November 1, 1935, when this issue was again callable, the call was not made. This \$185,000,000 issue again becomes callable May 1, 1936, as does an \$83,000,000 $4\frac{1}{4}$ -percent issue on July 1. I believe that we as representatives of the great farm States should insist that these issues be called.

Now, as to the operating expenses of the Federal land banks:

The Farm Credit Administration has refused to furnish the last monthly reports of the Federal land banks, the reports of the general agents' office, which is the fifth wagon wheel in the farm-loan system, and the operating expenses for each year for each of the banks. Interesting comparisons, damaging to bureaucratic control, could undoubtedly have been made. I hope you will join with me in insisting upon these figures so that we may aid the farmer stockholders in cutting out useless waste by restoring cooperative control.

However, some figures are available from which we can make reasonable deductions which go to explain why the Farm Credit Administration is so reluctant to furnish the requested statistics.

The operating expenses of the bank in my district, Omaha, for the first 10 months of 1935, were $2,469,294.75. This bank, which, from 1918 to 1930, paid an average annual dividend of about 10 percent, is having its substance wasted by the impractical theories and personnel imposed upon the bank. The continued management of that bank by President Hogan and his associates prior to 1933 would have been much more economical and efficient than through the supergovernment which Washington has imposed upon it.

The operating expenses of the 12 Federal land banks from July 1, 1933, to June 30, 1935, were $34,229,351.05. These expenses July 1, 1935, to December 31, 1935, were $7,763,949.09. The expense continued at practically the old extravagant level, though business is considerably less. Bureaucracy hangs on and continues to find new theories, to dictate bond management, to dominate the associations, to duplicate other agricultural agencies, and to assume to itself the virtue of alone being able to direct from Washington the business of the banks which the farmers of America have built and maintained.

Let us look at some of the figures which are available:

In 1934, 190,147 loans were closed by the Federal land banks for a total of $730,367,140. The banks had 10,495 employees.

In 1935, 58,968 loans were closed for a total of $248,671,200. Total employees in 1935 were 9,162; only one-third the business, but the number of employees scarcely affected. This helps to explain the refusal to furnish a statement of the banks' operating expenses.

Bureaucracy has devised ways and means to perpetuate itself at the expense of the farmers' banks despite the decline in business.

So much for the first two provisions of H. R. 11502. The desirability of establishing a credit agency board in each district to manage all the other credit agencies except the Federal land banks is obvious.

They occupy a different—a short-term credit field. They are owned almost entirely by the Government. Their operations should not be confused with the Federal land banks, owned by the farmers, with the resulting diversion of land-bank officials from the long-term-mortgage problems which demand all their attention. The separation will eliminate the general agent supergovernment over the Federal land banks, and free their executive officials to cooperate with farm-loan associations in restoring practical and economical management.

The fourth provision is necessary to provide a management board for the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

I conceive that this Congress, representative of the great farm States of the Nation, has no more important duty here than the restoration of the Federal farm-loan system to its fundamental cooperative principles. H. R. 11502 is good Americanism, good democracy, and a recognition of our legal and moral duty to the farmers of America who purchased stock in the farm-loan system, 650,000 of them, who have invested $110,000,000.

I venture the assertion that with the restoration of cooperative control, as provided in the Farm Loan Act before 1933, which is accomplished by H. R. 11502, the personnel and expenses of the Farm Credit Administration of Washington and each of the Federal land banks can quickly be reduced by 50 percent, and that a practical administration of the banks, freed from autocratic Washington dictation, will not only effect these economies but will otherwise result in more efficient, sympathetic, and profitable administration of the banks. The past records of the Federal Farm Loan Board and of the Federal land banks offer convincing evidence of the correctness of this statement.

THE FOREIGN SERVICE

The SPEAKER. Under the special order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to protest to the House the employment by the State Department of such a large percentage of men and women of foreign allegiance in our Foreign Service. It is true, for the most part, they are clerks, and a majority are in the lower-paid brackets. Nevertheless, they occupy key positions, and through their hands move highly important data and information. There can be no secrecy in our Foreign Service, when, out of 1,633 clerks employed in foreign countries, 919 claim loyalty and allegiance to another flag and another country.

Our procedure is a marked contrast to that of foreign countries in America. Go to even the smaller embassies in Washington, and you will not find Americans employed in handling confidential papers.

These are disturbing days. With breathless excitement we watch events unfold in Europe which spell either war or the peace of the world. The attitude of America is of foremost consideration. Every country is anxious to influence our attitude. With the fullest respect to our clerical force abroad, one may question whether, in a great crisis, the clerk of foreign loyalty would not sacrifice the American Government, who pays his meal ticket and puts him in a confidential position, for the welfare of the country of his birth and loyalty. It would be natural for the clerk to do so.

In the handling of papers and work dealing with peace and friendly relations, we should not place our trust in foreign nationals. Neither should they have access to our files and thus open to foreign governments information which properly belongs only to the American Government.

The State Department prides itself on the secrecy of its dispatches and moves. How can there be secrecy when the whole picture is open for the inspection of men and women clerks of foreign loyalty? Why should aliens, in many instances, assemble the data as to what foreigners should be permitted to come into the United States? That is a most pertinent question. In the struggle for foreign trade, which should be an essential part of the work of our representatives abroad, we would unquestionably make greater progress if there was a 100-percent American drive behind the effort. I would not expect a foreign national to be wildly enthusiastic about American efforts to win trade from concerns in his own country.

When I observe how American interests have been sacrificed in some of the reciprocal treaties we have negotiated, I am forced to wonder if some of the data collected was not assembled by some of the foreign nationals who live on the American taxpayer but whose hearts are with their own countries.

There are 147 interpreters and translators in diplomatic missions and consulates. Fifteen are Americans and 132 are foreigners. Of the total number, 69 receive salaries of more than $1,000 a year and 78 less than that amount. I can understand the need of a number of foreign translators, but certainly the splendid schools of America turn out many students who would gladly take one of these positions and do the work well.

Some 15 Chinese writers are employed and their salaries range from $120 to $529, and I can concede readily it would be practically impossible to replace them.

The messengers, gardeners, janitors, doorkeepers, and minor employees number 1,084. The salaries of 26 are in excess of $1,000 and 1,058 below that sum. Of this group, 58 are Americans and 1,026 are foreigners.

The clerks employed number 1,633, and of this number only 714 are Americans. Of the 919 foreigners, 28 draw pay in excess of $1,000.

In considering these salaries it is only fair to recall that owing to the depreciated value of the American dollar they are paid an additional 40 percent. In other words, a clerk whose salary would be $1,000 would actually receive $1,400.

The plea is that it would cost more to employ Americans. That might have been true in the good old days, but it is not so now, and there is no likelihood, judging from our progress in the last 3 years, that it will be so in the immediate future.

In all the principal cities of Europe there are competent Americans anxious for this work. There are hundreds of American boys and girls coming out of our colleges who would jump at the opportunity of work abroad. The pay might be small, but it is infinitely better than idleness, and the average American would welcome the chance.

Furthermore, I am informed there are abroad many American World War veterans who could do this work and would like the chance to increase their income. Every foreign country is insisting employment shall go only to their own nationals, and why should not the American Government follow the same sound policy? I believe it is high time the State Department awakened to the unemployment situation of Americans, both at home and abroad, and gave more of these positions to Americans. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under special order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] for 10 minutes.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to me for 2 minutes?

Mr. LUCKEY. I will.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the gentleman from Nebraska has kindly yielded to me 2 minutes, and in that time I want to call attention to the sad plight that Pittsburgh is in today. Nothing can be said which exaggerates its distress. I left Pittsburgh yesterday at noon by plane. Since that time things are worse. All lights are cut off, all gas, all heat, and there is a shortage of food.

In the past we have had floods in other parts of the United States and the Members of the House have come to the aid of the people with liberal appropriations for relief. I am asking for that now. I would not have had to ask for that relief if we could have gotten more action heretofore in both Houses. Last year we passed a bill for the construction of reservoirs to prevent a situation just like this. The Senate has that bill now. We are still waiting. The city of Dayton had a flood in 1913, and reservoirs were constructed there afterward. We always do things after we have suffered a terrible loss in lives and property. I suppose it is the course of events to lock the stable after the theft. I am telling you that Pittsburgh is very hard hit. Men will be held out of work in the mills. I have seen the mills and they are submerged in water, the stores are flooded, and skiffs are running through the streets. Much merchandise is destroyed. I cannot exaggerate the situation. Whatever is said does not adequately describe the tragedy, and I kindly ask the Members to help me get this bill through for an appropriation for relief of the destitute in Pittsburgh.

W. J. BRYAN

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] for 10 minutes.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, I represent the first district of the State of Nebraska, the district that at one time was represented by the great Commoner, and I ask your indulgence that I may make a few observations at this time regarding my old neighbor and friend.

In these turbulent times, when war clouds are hovering over the world, when humanity is crying out for peace, and there is no peace, we can well pause for a few moments and contemplate the admonitions and teachings of one of the greatest contemporary apostles of peace. Today, the 19th day of March, there occurs the birthday anniversary of one of America's most illustrious sons and one of the world's great leaders in the cause of universal peace—the great Commoner, William Jennings Bryan. [Applause.]

It is now 40 years since the youthful Bryan, like a meteor out of the west, became the standard bearer of our great Democratic Party. For nearly a third of a century he held a commanding place in its councils. But even a greater place did he hold in the hearts of millions of the humble citizens of the land, whose cause he championed so nobly. Three times he was the standard bearer of his party, and three times he met defeat. But from each defeat he rose again, stronger and more illustrious than before. Whence came this power and whence this ever-growing popular acclaim?

The answer is that he consistently championed the cause of the common man and the cause of social justice. This he did with a fervor and a zeal that grew out of his religious faith. Armed with an undying faith in his God and a deep and sincere love and understanding of the common people, he never swerved from the course that made him the true defender of the rights of the humble against the powerful forces of privileged and entrenched greed. His great leadership paved the way for many a liberal reform measure. His great public service radiated from him influences for good, for clean government, for clean living, for faith in the Christianity of our fathers.

But not only was Bryan a great political leader and reformer, he was even greater as an advocate of national and world peace. This naturally followed from his discipleship of the great Prince of Peace, who taught us the Golden Rule. He believed that national righteousness was a prerequisite to national and world peace. He believed that justice was a nation's surest defense. Speaking before the House of Lords in London in 1906, he said:

If peace is to come in this world, it will come because people more and more clearly recognize the indissoluble tie that binds each human being to every other. If we are to build a permanent peace, it must be on the foundation of the brotherhood of man.

It was on the occasion of this address, delivered in the House of Lords, that the audience, representing the flower of European intellect and thought—an audience not easily moved—rose and acclaimed the speaker.

When the World War clouds rolled over Europe Bryan was among the first to sense the real danger. He became an ardent advocate of strict neutrality, and as Secretary of State he opposed loans to foreign powers, holding that such a policy could have only one result—our ultimate entry into the war. During those trying times he gave his best to save his country from the catastrophe that loomed ahead. When we were launching on a policy of preparedness Bryan considered such a policy not only a menace to our peace and safety, but a challenge to the spirit of Christianity. The race in armaments he deemed a false philosophy—one which inevitably must lead into difficulties. At that time he was condemned and ridiculed. But who today dares to challenge the correctness of the position he then took? We have sacrificed thousands of our young manhood; we have wasted billions of our substance; and still the world is neither safe for democracy, nor have wars ceased. The mad armament race can have only one outcome—the ultimate world conflict resulting in the annihilation of our present civilization. Bryan saw the futility of it all.

Great as Bryan was as a political leader and as an advocate of peace, he was still greater as an exemplifier of a Christian life. In his religious writings his deep-spirited insight carries conviction and inspiration. In them he has given us some of the finest gems in American literature.

In closing may I quote just one paragraph of his, which we may well heed:

The enlightened conscience of our Nation should proclaim as the country's creed that "righteousness exalteth a nation" and that justice is a nation's surest defense. If there ever was a nation it is ours—if there ever was a time it is now—to put God's truth to a test. With an ocean rolling on either side and a mountain range along either coast that all the armies of the world could never climb, we ought not to be afraid to trust in "the wisdom of doing right."

EXEMPTION FROM TAXATION OF CERTAIN ASSETS OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 3978, with Mr. WHITTINGTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, we are now considering the taxation of shares of preferred stock of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I have something to say with reference to that, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that yesterday I spoke against increasing the appropriation for idle farm lands contained in the bill we had under discussion, and made the statement that we were wrecking the country. My colleague from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] later on commented upon those remarks and stated that I was absent from the room.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. The rule granting us 4 hours' debate on the bill under consideration provided that the debate should be confined to the bill. Many of us are unable to get time to properly discuss this bill. I think the time should be used for that purpose and not for any other purpose, and I make the point of order that the gentleman is not directing his remarks to the subject under discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. RICH. I am talking about the bill, and I am on the gentleman's side, too; this he will find out later. I just make mention of the fact that the flood situation is so bad in the west branch of the Susquehanna Valley, Pa., at Muncy, Williamsport, Jersey Shore, Lock Haven, and other points that necessarily I absented myself to go to the War Department and the Red Cross to secure their aid to do something for the people of that vicinity. They needed boats to get the people to high ground, food, and clothing.

I shall not dwell very much on what the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] stated in reference to me, but I shall take opportunity sometime later on, because I am just as much in favor of protecting the interest and welfare of the country as any individual in it; and when it comes to making a statement that I am opposed to taxes, that does not stand good, because I voted to increase taxes. The most serious question facing us today is to stop the ruthless expenditures that have been going on and bring in a good tax bill and try, if possible, to save this Nation. The serious situation confronting the Nation is ahead of us, and not behind us, and we should do things in a sound, sensible, sane business way. In order to get there faster, I will state to the gentleman from Virginia, we need more men like Senator CARTER GLASS and Governor BYRD if we hope to get there soon.

We are getting on to the point of taxation. We must have less spending or more taxes. That is absolutely essential to keep the country from being wrecked. No one knows it better than the gentleman from Virginia. Ever since I have been a Member of this House, and for years before, this Nation has been issuing tax-free bonds. Every time we consider any legislation in the House endeavoring to stop the issuance of tax-free bonds someone puts a wrench in the machinery, and the bill never gets through. Members of Congress always have some reason why we should not stop the issuance of tax-free bonds which give the men who have nothing to do, with a lot of money, the rich men of the country, an opportunity to make their investment in securities that do not contribute anything toward the support of the Government. This is not right and should be stopped. Our tax base is getting narrower and narrower, and eventually you are going to kill what we call business, because you are afraid to put taxes on anything but business enterprise, and business enterprise is the thing today that is giving employment to the people of the country. Kill the business enterprises, and you kill progress, you kill the goose that lays the golden egg, you kill employment. Business has created initiative in mankind and permitted them to go ahead. Kill business, and what have you left? We must take care of the unemployed. We must take care of the people who want jobs and give them work in order to support the Government, and not have the people of this country supported by the Government. That will break it down eventually. That is what this administration is doing. Read my remarks of yesterday.

What is the object of this bill we have under discussion now? I realize there would be many opportunities to stop tax-free bonds and tax-free stocks if they were not Government funds. The only reason I want to tax this stock that is issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is because this is an opportunity to get an entering wedge. We must start sometime. Probably more of the Members of Congress will not think they are injuring some constituent back home if they start now. Perhaps they will have enough backbone and enough desire to stop the thing they want to stop if we will start right here on the taxing of securities owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. If we do that, probably this will be the entering wedge to stop tax-free bonds.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Can the gentleman explain to us, who have been unable to get time on this bill because we oppose it, by what procedure this bill comes in and what the possibilities would be if all committees who had bills defeated were able to bring in similar bills under similar conditions?

Mr. RICH. I presume that the bankers of this country—and I am one of them, as I am interested in a couple of small banks in my country—have no more right to tax-free bonds than the farmers or the laborers in this country. [Applause.] It has come to the point where we in the Government must obey the golden rule—this I try to do in my business—treat everybody alike. What right have you to give the bankers of this country tax-free stocks and permit them to issue certificates and get interest on them, when you do not let the farmers do it? That is one reason we have the Frazier-Lemke bill here. Farmers have the same right to demand those things that the bankers have. We must stop tax-free securities by the Federal Government rather than issue more, regardless of who may own them. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Does not the gentleman understand that if this bill is defeated the bankers will not pay one cent of the tax, but it will come out of the treasury of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. RICH. I told the gentleman a few minutes ago that I hoped we had enough men in the House to start right here and stop tax-free stocks and bonds. If we can defeat this bill, eventually we will be able to stop tax-free bonds, and that is what I want to try to do. I do not care who owns the stock, the Government or an individual—individuals make up the Government, so what is the difference?

Mr. REILLY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Is the gentleman not aware of the fact that the farmers do get tax-free securities when their mortgages or bonds are undertaxed?

Mr. RICH. I do not know of the farmer getting tax-free securities. We want to treat them all alike, I said. We are not giving the farmers any undue advantage over the bankers. So eventually we are hoping to correct that situation. It is a Government evil, issuing tax-free stock and securities; that only helps the rich, and I am for the poor taxpayer.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Is it not a fact that if we use the same logic and the same reasoning in connection with the farmer, when the Federal land bank purchases a note or a mortgage against a farmer at one-half the value of the farm, then we should permit that farmer to apply tax exemption on one-half his farm when the local tax assessor comes around; that is, if we adopt the same principle for him that is embodied in this bill?

Mr. RICH. I presume the same thing would apply, that we should treat the farmer the same as we treat the banker. I think it is imperative now that tax-free securities should be eliminated by all Government agencies; that we should have a uniform amount of taxation, whether it be the farmer or whether it be the banker or whether it be the labor unions or whoever it is, so that we must pay the same rate of taxation. That is what I would hope would come out of this bill if we defeat it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expired.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is of such importance that the membership of the committee ought to be here, and I make a point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, to a House that is seemingly gun-shy on banking legislation, I know of nothing more persuasive for the passage of this bill than the remarks just made by my good friend and colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman confesses to us that he is a banker. He states that he is opposed to the bill. If that be true, and if this House can be frightened into voting for or against all legislation that comes out of the Committee on Banking and Currency because it is in behalf of or against bankers, then you have a banker testifying against this bill, which, by that token, ought to be persuasive enough to pass this bill today. [Applause.]

Someone raised the question as to why, after this bill was defeated, it should come before the committee again. I will say, first of all, that when that bill was before the committee 92 Members of this House failed to vote. They were absent. They constitute 20 percent of the membership. This in itself certainly is reason enough why we ought to have a reconsideration of this bill.

Secondly, I suppose we as members of the Banking Committee were lacking in eloquence and persuasion to make the provisions of that bill intelligible to the Members of this House, and if we have failed in this respect we ought to try all over again. We would be derelict in our duty if we permitted the Members of this House to wander around in the labyrinths of misunderstanding and misapprehension. So the bill is back, and I hope it will pass. I say to you very frankly that it may get only one vote, and that vote may be mine. Certainly I shall vote for the bill. In doing so I shall not be unmindful of the fact that the State of Illinois has a greater interest in this bill than some 15 or 20 States put together. The R. F. C. loans on preferred stock to the 205 banks in Illinois is more than $78,000,000. The nearest to it is Texas, with $21,000,000. Then you have a variety of States with only $1,000,000. The State of Illinois, the banks of Illinois, and the people of Illinois, therefore, have a greater interest in this bill today than any other State; and being quite mindful of that fact I shall vote for the bill.

We bring the bill before this House and recommend its passage for a variety of reasons. In the first place, it is a very proper bill, because we are protecting the sovereignty of the Federal Government. Secondly, it is a fair and an equitable bill because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is an arm, an integral instrumentality, of the Government; and unless we pass this bill we are going to clog this instrumentality in its proper operation for the banks in all the States of the Union. The third reason why we have the bill before you, although perhaps it may not be considered as a reason, is the fact that it would be unjust and unfair to poke Santa Claus on the nose as a reward for his good ministrations. When the R. F. C. came into the State of Illinois, and not only saved but rehabilitated and resuscitated any number of banks, what ingrates we would be if we failed to protect the R. F. C. by exempting this preferred stock from taxation in Illinois. I do not believe any other reason is necessary in order to point out to the House the necessity for this bill. This good work must go forward without obstacles.

Some opposition has been developed, led largely by my good and ingenious friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. I want to say to him, with all deference, that I think he puts up the most ingenious, the most plausible, and the most unsound argument I ever heard. Now, let us analyze the arguments of the gentleman from Texas. In the first place, he comes before this committee and states that by a law passed in 1864 giving States, counties, and municipalities the right to tax holders of national-bank stock, that by virtue of existing law today the R. F. C., as a holder of this preferred stock, ought to be taxed. When you go back to 1864 and examine the background under which our national banking system was set up you will find that the reason that provision was put in the bill was as a sop in order to get votes. I had them send me all the CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS of that 1864 session of Congress, and so, last night by lamplight, I examined into the background.

Is there any reason under the new circumstances that are presented in 1936 that this Congress cannot expressly or inferentially repeal anything that was done in 1864? We have done it before and we can do it now to meet new conditions. When it becomes necessary to protect the sovereignty of the Federal Government there is no reason in the wide world why it should not be done. That is argument no. 1. Argument no. 2 is that you might be favoring the R. F. C. as against a private holder of preferred stock. For example, the R. F. C. might go into Texarkana, Tex., and take $60,000 of a $100,000 issue of preferred stock, the other $40,000 being sold to citizens in that town. The argument is advanced that if you exempt the R. F. C. you still permit taxation of the other $40,000 held by private citizens. There is no soundness in this argument for the reason that dividends to the R. F. C. are limited to 3½ percent.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not yield; the gentleman had his time yesterday.

The $40,000 held by private citizens returns a greater income; so you have a cushion of 5 percent or 6 percent as against 3½ percent to the R. F. C. You have an allowance there to provide for taxes in the case of a private holder, and so this argument does not hold.

Thirdly, they said if we apply this bill we are discriminating in favor of the Federal Government and the national banks as against State governments and State banks, and that we are removing property which is assessable and out of which taxes might accrue to the State and the municipality. Let us examine it very briefly in this fashion: Here is a bank with $500,000 of capital stock. It is in an impaired condition. The Comptroller of the Currency and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation step into the picture and finally they say, "Here you have $500,000 of capital stock on the books, but it is worth only 50 cents on the dollar."

So that while your ledger, your figures, and all your paraphernalia show a capital stock of $500,000, the fact of the matter is that the $500,000 is only worth $250,000. They reform the capital structure and reduce it so as to reflect the actual value of $250,000. Have you taken away anything from the State by so doing? No. The reason is you do not assess against the par value of the stock. In every case you assess against the actual value of the stock, and whether it be Texas, Illinois, or any other State makes no difference. The assessor and the tax collector can come in and collect only on $250,000 of value, irrespective of the fact that there was originally a capital structure of $500,000. You have not taken a dime away from the State. When the R. F. C. steps in and subscribes to the preferred stock it is simply repairing the condition of that bank and takes not one dime away from the State. There is the argument in brief against this bill. The argument is thoroughly unsound, very ingenious and plausible, and is presented for the purpose of handicapping an arm of the Federal Government in carrying on its benevolent work in connection with rehabilitating the bank structure of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I have just this final word to say in connection with my own State. The R. F. C. has subscribed to stock, notes, and debentures to the extent of more than $78,000,000 in the State of Illinois.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose, on the basis of a tax rate of something like $68.55 a thousand, where we assess one-half of the value, that the total amount of tax might be as much as $2,500,000 on that amount; but on the other side of the ledger what has happened? The very fact that the R. F. C. has come in and bailed out a lot of our banks has created millions and millions of dollars of assessable value. In the case of a single bank in Chicago, where the common stock was selling for $24 a share before the R. F. C. went in, it is now selling for $174 a share on the market, and because of the R. F. C. rehabilitation it has added $112,000,000 worth of taxable value to the property of Illinois. Along with that, it has saved those banks, saved the depositors, and enhanced the income of the stockholders.

Mr. Chairman, is there anybody so bold as to say that if we pass this bill we are going to encroach upon the taxable values for State purposes and take something away that was formerly there? What is actually happening is that we are in no sense infringing upon the taxable values of the State. As a matter of fact, we have only added new values because of the R. F. C. operation. In conclusion, may I say that whether this bill gets any other votes or not it will get one vote from me, representing in part the State of Illinois. I admonish the Members that we have a more vital and a larger interest in this bill than any other State in the Union.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. I was going to ask the gentleman from Illinois to give the other side of the picture in the case of the Texarkana bank, if the R. F. C. had not gone in there, but I note he has given it in the case of a Chicago bank.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I also yield the gentleman from North Carolina 5 minutes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I hope I may proceed for a few minutes without interruption. I shall then be glad to yield for questions.

This bill is sound, meritorious, and in the public interest. Its passage will merely restore to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an instrumentality of the Federal Government, as I stated on the floor February 25, its constitutional immunity from taxation, which immunity Congress unquestionably intended it should have at the time of the passage of the act in 1932. Its necessity arises as a result of a recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Baltimore National Bank against Maryland State Tax Commission, in which the Court held that article X of the act specifically exempting the Corporation, its franchise, capital, reserves, surplus, and income from taxation, both State and Federal, was not effective in the face of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes passed in 1864 which expressly authorizes States to tax national-bank shares, within certain limitations, regardless of ownership. The immunity from taxation upon the passage of this bill applies to the R. F. C. alone because it is a Federal agency. The bill, therefore, does no more than to close an unintended legislative gap. It will not in any way affect the rights of any State taxing authority or municipal authority to levy taxes against the preferred stock, notes, or debentures held by any individual or other corporation.

Unless Congress acts on the bill now before it to exempt these holdings of this Government agency, the State and other local authorities will go ahead and try to collect their money, following the Supreme Court decision upholding such position in Maryland. The entire burden of additional taxes will fall upon the Federal Government directly and indirectly upon the taxpayers and people of America. As a result, the R. F. C., which stepped in—good Samaritan-like—to help rebuild the capital structure of a lot of banks in this country which might otherwise have been compelled to close their doors, will have to pay for acting in the public interest. Since the financial repair and rescue work of the R. F. C. through its preferred-stock and capital-note campaign has not been generally understood by the public, it is naturally expected that some should see "red" when mention is made of extending aid to these institutions. After the bank holiday and a clean bill of health was given to a majority of the banks everywhere, there remained many with a weakened capital structure. They were too good to close and too weak to remain open for long. Portfolios of the banks were jammed with collateral which might one day come back but which for the moment was without marketable value. To have written off all these erstwhile real assets would have left many banks in a condition where their capital would have been so seriously impaired that State and Federal supervisory officials would have had no choice but to close their doors.

The country's nerves, as all of you know, were in no condition to hear further banging of bank doors. "Reconstruction" was necessary, as the name of the great Federal agency was called which came to their rescue. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation started its repair work to protect the depositors and save the values of the communities in which these banks were located. It proposed to rebuild the capital structure of these institutions through the lending of Government funds. Because of the varying laws in different States, the plan involved preferred stock in some cases, capital notes in others, and debentures in still others. So that the plan would not brand every weak bank in the country and possibly be conducive to further runs, the R. F. C. solicited the cooperation of several of the strongest institutions, so that there would be no discrimination. In the execution of this reconstructive program, the R. F. C. entered the picture, not for the purpose of going into the banking business, nor for the purpose of lending money at a profit; its one objective was to save the communities involved and put these institutions back in a position to function in behalf of the public. What Member of this House would have opposed the R. F. C.'s effort to extend assistance in this way to his own community? Where is the man who has so little gratitude that he will not express his appreciation for the splendid accomplishments which this campaign has brought about? Who would vote for an amendment that would make it more difficult for some communities that have not yet had their institutions repaired?

In carrying out this program the R. F. C. borrowed money from the United States Treasury at 2½ percent. Mr. Jones, chairman of the R. F. C., in working out the plan, figured that his expenses of operation would be about one-half of 1 percent, and that would leave one-fourth of 1 percent to cover individual losses. This clearly shows that there can be no profit to the Government with which to pay taxes. On this basis, the institutions selling the R. F. C. preferred stock or capital notes were required to pay 3½ percent for the 5 years, and 4 percent thereafter. This is a contractual relationship between the lender and the borrower and cannot be changed except by mutual consent. This program involved no replacement of private capital, because the agency took only what individual interests failed to subscribe.

As a matter of fact, however, the confidence which the R. F. C. showed in these institutions by its willingness to purchase the stock or notes greatly influenced many local citizens to come to the rescue of their banks, and the campaign has involved increasing capital stock by individuals in the various communities to the extent of approximately $150,000,000. The banks, under the agreement with the R. F. C., are permitted to retire the issue as rapidly as improved conditions dictate. It is not an exaggeration to say that a majority of the 6,000 banks furnished capital by the R. F. C. would in all probability have been forced to suspend, Mr. Jones said recently in a statement before our committee. This would have come on the heels of a loss to the country of 5,500 banks in the emergency between 1931 and 1933.

It requires no great stretch of the imagination to contemplate the added distress that would have come to the millions of depositors under these circumstances and to the country. An effort now to penalize this work must be based upon misunderstanding or a failure on the part of some of us to show a proper regard for suffering depositors.

Far from taking away from any community any taxable asset which was placed in the community by its local citizens or which it had prior to this campaign on the part of the R. F. C., the Federal Government, through this great agency, has added taxable values to every community which amounted in the aggregate to many millions of dollars. Under the plan of retirement of the preferred stock and notes, it is reasonable to conclude that not less than 700 or 800 million dollars in common stock or reserves will be available, at the end of the retirement of the R. F. C. holdings, for local taxation.

Whatever else has contributed to recovery, the recapitalization of banks was like replacing a rotten foundation with a new and sound one. A distressed country, as Mr. Jones said, could not support an unsound banking system, but a sound banking system could support a distressed country. The soundness, fairness, and merits of this measure has the approval, according to the statement of Mr. Jones, of the President of the United States. It has been unanimously recommended by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate and the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, composed of Democratic and Republican Members. The bill, with the exception of a minor amendment, has already passed the Senate. The Rules Committee granted unanimously, according to my information, the rule which we passed yesterday.

The measure has the wholehearted recommendation of the ablest and most effective financial genius this generation has known, the Honorable Jesse H. Jones, Chairman of the Corporation, whose work has done more to save America during this crisis than any other man in the United States with the exception of our President. It also has the wholehearted recommendation of the Honorable Leo T. Crowley, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, who has depended upon Mr. Jones and other able members of his staff in working out the serious problems involving the restoration of banks, to the end that they might come under the protection of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. In my opinion, there can be no sound or legitimate reason for voting against this measure. It will place all the banks upon an equal footing and eliminate the discrimination against the national banks in the matter of taxation. It will permit the R. F. C. to go forward in its work to lend a helping hand in the scattered places throughout the country where rescue and repair work may be needed. It is not believed, however, that much additional work of this character is necessary, for everybody knows that our banking structure as a whole is now upon a sound and solid foundation.

I do not have the time, nor do I think it necessary, to discuss the merits of the Vandenberg and Brown amendments. Both of these are designed to aid the orderly liquidation of closed institutions, by a reduction in the interest rate on loans from the R. F. C. The Brown amendment is a natural sequel to the Vandenberg amendment and is designed to insure that the reduced interest rate to the receiver shall be passed along to the distressed debtors of the institution. In my opinion, this is just and proper, and I am confident that it will afford great relief to many a struggling debtor, who is trying faithfully to meet his obligations to the closed institutions as rapidly as possible so that the assets may be distributed to the depositors.

Now, let us examine the arguments that have been leveled against the bill and their sources.

Mr. Chairman, during my 6 years as a Member of Congress I do not believe that I have ever seen as much confusion surrounding the merits of a bill, or as much misunderstanding as exists today with respect to the consideration of this particular bill. I accord every man the right to his honest conviction. I know, however, that as heretofore stated that there are some Members of the House who cannot help from seeing "red" whenever a bank or a banker's name is mentioned. Many extraneous considerations have been injected into this discussion and most of them are appeals to prejudice. This is very unfortunate. I assume that those who are responsible have done so with a sincere purpose. I do not believe, however, that any argument has ever been made against the merits of a bill, since I have been here, that was more plausible yet as perfectly unsound as the argument made by my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. Now, let us clear the track as we go along. What is pertinent to the issue here? There is absolutely nothing in this measure which involves infringement upon State rights, regardless of any statement to the contrary. There is nothing in this measure that involves the principle of tax-exempt securities—not one single phrase. That's another old herring.

Mr. Chairman, as I have in my prepared statement tried to set forth clearly, this bill merely would exempt the securities owned and held by the Reconstruction Corporation. If this bill is not passed the burden falls upon the taxpayers of America. It will constitute a rank discrimination against the taxpayers of America. It will be a rank discrimination against certain banks. It will be a rank discrimination against certain States. The tax-exempt securities plan involves taxing securities in the hands of individuals. Under this bill the securities held by the R. F. C. will be exempt only so long as they are held by that Corporation. When put back into the communities they become taxable, as other similar securities. If you refuse to pass this bill you might as well agree to enact legislation which will make all relief funds provided for recovery, unemployment, and to care for the destitute, in this country, taxable. These funds were for relief and rescue purposes. No one can truthfully deny that. My good friend from Texas would not dare to have stood on this floor in 1933 and opposed an extension of aid to the banks in his district by this Corporation, which was the only means of saving the deposits of thousands of his constituents.

Mr. Chairman, let us not forget the ditch from which we were dug or tear down the bridge that carried us across. Who is there in this presence who would have opposed this preferred-stock and capital-note campaign in 1933 or 1934?

This Corporation, as above stated, did not desire to enter the field of private business. It has never done so with the idea of any gain or making any profit. It went in because the local communities had broken down financially, and individuals from one end of the country to the other were afraid of bank stocks. Therefore, every dollar that has been placed in various parts of the country to recapitalize and rehabilitate the banking structure, was put there because the local communities could not do it, and it was an addition to capital stock—as I have tried to show you—rather than a replacement. Taxing this agency would be similar to punishing the good Samaritan and rewarding the Levite and priest.

My friend talks about his bank in Texarkana. To begin with, he does not even know the basis upon which the stock in the bank to which he refers is taxed. Bank stock in 31 States is taxed according to its fair, true value regardless of whether the par is $25 or $100 per share. The assets of the bank, after deducting the liabilities, determine the fair value of the bank stock. Every man who knows anything about banking understands this.

If you refuse to pass this bill, you discriminate against national banks, because the capital notes, debentures, and preferred stock of State banks are not taxable. They cannot be for two reasons: One is because a State cannot tax the securities of the Federal Government, and the other is because of the provision in the act itself which provides that the Corporation, its franchise, surplus, reserves, and earnings are exempt from all taxation, both State and Federal.

This, Mr. Chairman, should make that point very clear. This bill is not a bankers' bonus as the gentleman from Texas contends. He calls all of them the same name. Every dollar of the burden will fall upon the R. F. C., because of a contractual relation existing between the R. F. C. and the banks. The banks will not receive a penny's benefit. Read Mr. Jones' statement for corroboration of that statement.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. If that is true as to past transactions then as to future transactions, the banks will be required to pay it, will they not?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. PATMAN. That is what I want to do in accordance with what I thought was an understanding.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The banks would pay it, but it would be charged, of course, to the stockholders in the banks. Of course, I know nothing about your understanding, for you had none with me. It is Greek to my ears.

Mr. PATMAN. That is all right if they are able and willing to pay it and able to pay large salaries in addition. Why not require them to pay it?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Then I say, Mr. Chairman, if you do that—

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. I had not wished to interrupt the statement of my colleague, but since the gentleman has yielded I should like to ask two questions.

First, how much is it estimated it will cost the R. F. C. if this bill does not pass and they have to pay this tax?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is very hard to estimate, because it would depend on how many States having the right to tax capital stock would go back and tax them for all the years from the date of the issuance of the stock. It has been estimated it would cost between five and seven million dollars.

Mr. LAMBETH. What was the profit of the R. F. C. for the last fiscal year?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. The profit on all of its operations?

Mr. LAMBETH. Yes; its net profit.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I do not know. I understand that up to 60 days ago the profit was estimated at $115,000,000, but that, of course, is problematical, since many of its loans have not been liquidated. The hope is that eventually it may go out of business without loss or profit.

Mr. LAMBETH. The other question I wish to ask for information is this: Is there any difference between this bill and the bill the House previously voted on?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Yes; there is one difference. There is an amendment which provides that the R. F. C. shall make loans to closed institutions in receivership at a rate not exceeding three and a half percent, and then this amendment is further amended in the bill by requiring that where a receiver borrows from the R. F. C. at three and a half percent, or not in excess of three and a half percent, the receiver cannot charge the debtors of the closed institution in excess of four and a half percent from the date it receives the loan at three and a half percent.

Mr. LAMBETH. But that does not affect the proposition as to taxation of the stock. That remains the same as in the previous bill.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. That is not changed. It is identical.

Now, to get back to the inquiry of my friend from Texas, suppose in the future you would permit the local communities to tax this stock, the burden, of course, would fall on the weak, distressed institution that was trying to regain its health in order to protect its depositors. My feeling is that a vote against this bill is, in effect, a vote against the depositors of a closed institution or a weak institution seeking reconstruction, regardless of where it may be located.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. It would also be a discrimination, and a very severe one, against the States that do not tax these securities.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I made that point at the beginning of my remarks.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Now, let us see what has been the course of my good friend, for whom I have the highest respect and whom I like, with regard to this bill. The gentleman has "wobbled in and wobbled out and left this House all in doubt." He started out by undertaking to oppose the bill on the ground that it deprived local communities of taxable values. This argument fell flat, as everybody, I am sure, will agree.

As a matter of fact, the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation stated before our committee in his presence that, aside from the indirect benefit flowing to communities in improved and increased valuation of all kinds of property, under the retirement plan the properly managed banks would ultimately have between eight and nine hundred million dollars in excess taxable value that they would not have had except for this great reconstruction campaign that the R. F. C. has carried on in helping repair and rebuild about 6,000 banks.

Now, when that one fails, he moves to another course in his strategy, he now in desperation wants to protect the local communities in the future. He is willing to condone past operations. Magnanimous to the point of complete inconsistency!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Now, he comes back and says that if the national banks can issue capital notes he thinks we can get together. Get together on what?

Mr. PATMAN rose.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I do not yield. Oh, I know it pinches. [Laughter.] The preferred stock is the only security in question that can be taxed under the recent decision of the Supreme Court. Then, pray tell me how an amendment authorizing national banks to issue capital notes which are already nontaxable would add to the taxable values of his district. Such a contention is absurd.

Falling down with that, my friend, resourceful as he is, comes back and says, "Let us strike out the word 'hereafter'." Strike it out for what? In order that the local communities can tax the stock. Take the situation in his own town. Unfortunately, the clean-up campaign is not altogether over. We know, however, that great recovery has been brought about and a sound sill has been put in place of the rotten one which was under the banks in this country. But he wants certain banks to be taxed and other banks not to be taxed. Would that be discriminatory? He is consistent only in his inconsistency.

Now, remember this: He has been talking about precedents. He has been talking about discrimination. He is the man who first mentioned those words. Now he has to swallow them. Where is he at this hour? He is all alone. He has not a foot to stand on. We all know that if we accepted his view, it would be both rank discrimination and an upset of all precedents. With all his good sense it is not working here.

Again, I ask, in conclusion, who is supporting this bill, and how did it get here? Let us repeat. It is backed by the unanimous vote of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. It was passed by the Senate, and a rule on it was reported out favorably and unanimously by the Committee on Rules. It is recommended by the Honorable Jesse Jones and the Honorable Leo T. Crowley, and it is brought here with the approval of the President of the United States. Will you accept their judgment or follow Mr. PATMAN's? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair announces that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] has 58 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] 35 minutes remaining.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. How much time has been used by the proponents of this legislation and how much time by the opponents of it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is without information on that point. The gentleman is as good a judge of that as the Chair. The control of the time under the rule is with the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, this bill arises from a decision of the Supreme Court, which caused considerable annoyance. The case was Baltimore Banking Commission against the State Taxing Commission of Maryland. Maryland sought to tax the preferred stock of the Maryland banks held by the R. F. C. If you read the decision, particularly the majority opinion of Mr. Justice Cardozo, you will find that the Court strained every effort to make this bill, as it were, unnecessary, strained every effort to prevent tax on the Maryland bank preferred stock. We passed the R. F. C. Act originally and exempted from taxation the franchise of the R. F. C., its capital, its reserves, and its surplus. Beyond peradventure of doubt, if the R. F. C. at the time of the original enactment had had the right to invest in preferred stock of banks and thus to save them from ruin and thus rescue them, we would have included in those original provisions of exemption the preferred stock. I cannot conceive of any man in this Chamber, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] included, who would have the temerity to deny that. If that were the intention originally of Congress, I cannot see why there would be anyone here to place this obstacle in the path of the R. F. C. at this late hour. What is going to happen if we do not pass this bill? There are 17 States that do not in their judgment tax the R. F. C. stock which is owned as preferred stock in the banks. These are the States—and the gentlemen from those States should harken, because there will be involved the rankest kind of discrimination against the population and citizenry of those States: Louisiana, Maine, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Utah, Vermont, Washington, Wisconsin, Wyoming, Alabama, California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New York, Oklahoma, and Oregon. Mr. Jones said:

Taxing R. F. C.-owned preferred stock by the other 31 States and their political subdivisions will be discriminating against those 17 States.

I say, if those 17 States do not tax, then the other 31 States should not have the right to tax; and that is what we do practically by this bill. We take away that right, which they never should have had in the first instance.

There is no question that that argument is sound. We in New York recognize it because this is what we did: We had our legislature in New York pass a provision preventing State tax upon such preferred stock, because we recognized the wholesome good done by the R. F. C.; and I say to the gentleman from Texas that we in New York do not bite the hand that feeds us. You do, I say to the gentleman from Texas, that by insisting on your amendment or by opposition to this bill. Were it not for the R. F. C., we in New York would be in the doldrums, and Lord knows where they would be in Texas. Very likely they would be in limbo, and, I repeat, we will not bite the hand that feeds us in New York. We said this through our New York Legislature enactment, as follows:

All interest paid or accrued during the year of indebtedness and all dividends paid during the year on preferred stock held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be deducted in determining net income.

In other words, we in New York recognize that that money which was received from the R. F. C. in return for which the banks issued preferred stock was really a loan, and that the interest paid on that loan or on the preferred stock is a part of the cost of the operation of the bank. If you refuse to pass this bill, what will happen? The R. F. C. is not going to lose money. If it must pay this tax, or if you allow the States or municipalities to exact the tax, which must be paid by the R. F. C. and not by the banks, then the R. F. C. will simply pass that tax on to future borrowing banks. They will not make any more loans in the form of preferred stock. They will make an actual loan, and, instead of charging 3½ percent, which is the rate on preferred stock, the banks in these 17 other States, that may apply for loans in the future, will have to pay for the loans probably 5 or 6 percent. That would be a rather prohibitive cost, and I ask the gentlemen from those States to consider this very seriously. In other words, if the R. F. C. must pay a tax, it will pass it on. It cannot pass it on to the banks in the 31 States. The dividend rate is fixed. It cannot be changed—even by statute. But to make up that loss, due to payment of tax in the 31 States, it would naturally increase its rates for loans in the future to banks, most of which banks would be in the nontaxing States.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman does not mean to say that the R. F. C. could pass this tax on in the 31 States where the preferred stock and capital notes are issued?

Mr. CELLER. No; they could not, but the other States principally will have to bear the brunt of it all.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman knows there is a definite 5-year contract during which the interest could not be raised beyond 3½ percent.

Mr. CELLER. In those 31 States they would still have to pay only 3½ percent. I think it is 20 years. They are supposed to retire at the rate of 5 percent per year.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The 3½-percent dividend rate is a 5-year rate, fixed by Congress.

Mr. CELLER. Oh, that is correct; but do you not see what a terrible burden you are placing upon my State and the State of Massachusetts and these other 15 States?

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MORAN. I am asking purely for information, as to how one of the 17 States, of which mine is one, would be affected, since we do not have that particular system of taxation.

Mr. CELLER. This is what would happen: The Reconstruction Finance Corporation would take no more preferred stock. It would make loans, but it would have to make a uniform rate all over the country. It would not make one rate for one State and a different rate for another State, so if a bank in your State is in distress and wants to get some money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the R. F. C. will not buy preferred stock but will make a loan.

Therefore your State will have to pay a larger rate on the loan, larger than the $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent rate on the preferred stock. Aside from the discrimination, it is a very serious situation, because it is far more to the advantage of a bank to issue its preferred stock than it is to make a loan, because a preferred-stock arrangement does not interfere unduly with its capital structure. Preferred stock is in the nature of a capital investment. A loan appears on the liability side of the bank. It weakens the bank in that community to that extent, and therefore we must be very careful what we do in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 4 additional minutes.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MORAN. Would the gentleman anticipate that, if this bill fails to pass, in one of the 17 States the only difference between the present status and the status afterward would be that banks in that particular State would have to pay taxes, if any?

Mr. CELLER. There is no question about it, the States that now do not tax will have the right to do so.

Mr. MORAN. That being the case, if we do not pay any taxes in the State under that system, it is not clear to me why we will be penalized.

Mr. CELLER. Because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will have to make a uniform rate on the loans. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in order to make up the taxes which it has to pay in the 31 other States, will have to make it up in the interest rate on future loans.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman did not yield to me yesterday, but I will be more generous and yield to him.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman will remember that I did not have control of any time. I am just an opponent here on this bill, and I do not have any time.

Mr. CELLER. I forgive the gentleman.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman is making an incorrect statement, in good faith, I am sure, but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has already made one loan since this Supreme Court decision, and in that loan they required the bank to pay $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent interest, but required them to continue to pay local taxes as before if this exemptions bill does not pass. If this bill goes through as I want it, the rate will remain uniform at $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent in those 17 States, but in the other States they will pay $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent and pay taxes, because they have a different system of taxation in those 31 States.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is entirely incorrect in that regard, because common sense will tell us differently. The R. F. C. may have made such a loan, but it had a right to rely upon the good faith of the Congress. It had a right to believe Congress would remedy the situation.

For instance, the Treasury, when it loans money to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, must charge a certain amount of interest. It charges upward of $2\frac{3}{4}$ percent. If they make their loans at $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent, there is only a difference of three-quarters of 1 percent. When you figure the cost of operation, salaries, and so forth, you will find very readily that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation cannot get along with that differential. It is inconceivable that the R. F. C. would not then lose money. For example, they must pay these additional taxes. Where is the money coming from? The Reconstruction Finance Corporation would operate at an absolute deficit. Furthermore, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to have some losses. Mr. Jones admitted that his loss in the Central Bank & Republic Co., of Chicago, might amount ultimately to \$10,000,000. Who is going to make up these losses? Certainly those 31 States ought to listen to this situation and at least agree that justice should be done. That is why we should pass this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. The gentleman is making an interesting statement as to why he thinks these 17 States would be unfairly discriminated against in case this bill fails to pass as it should. I am wondering on what he bases that, other than his statement that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to discriminate against those different States that have an entirely different system of taxation?

Mr. CELLER. I have the word of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation officials for that in the form of letters, and my own common sense.

Mr. McFARLANE. Can the gentleman cite one instance where that is true?

Mr. CELLER. The rate has not been increased yet. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is holding that in abeyance. They will increase the rates if you do not pass this bill.

Mr. McFARLANE. What makes the gentleman think so?

Mr. CELLER. It must naturally be so to avoid a loss. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has expired.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we have had a good deal of discussion about the provisions of this bill, but we have not had yet what might be called a historical statement of the reasons why this question comes before us today. We must go back to 1931, 1932, and 1933 when the banking structure of the United States began to break down. What happened? The securities held by banks in the form of bonds, in the form of notes of their customers, depreciated in value to the point where in a great many instances the capital stock, the margin of safety that this Government had set up by its laws for depositors, had been wiped out because of the decline in the value of the securities and the inability of the noteholders to pay their obligations to the banks.

What did the Comptroller of the Currency try to do under those circumstances? He first went to the stockholders of the banks—and when I speak of the Comptroller of the Currency I also speak in the same way of the banking commissioners in the various States—they went to the stockholders and said: "You must put up more money to repair the capital of your bank. Until you do so we cannot let you continue doing a banking business." As you know, the stockholders of the banks were pretty heavy losers, and in the great majority of cases it was impossible for those men to put up the money to rehabilitate the capital of the banks. What did we then do? We turned to the Government of the United States and we provided in the Emergency Banking Act of 1933 that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might buy preferred stock in national and State banks.

Let me digress here to say that all this talk about capital notes and capital debentures rose solely because of the fact that in several of the States—not very many—under the State law preferred stock could not be issued by State banks. This is the reason we have this complication of capital notes and debentures.

This preferred stock was supplied by the Government of the United States to rehabilitate the capital of these banks. Stop and consider a moment what would have happened had that preferred stock not been supplied, and let us assume that the common-stock holders could have supplied a minimum amount of capital and that we could have worried along without preferred stock. If this had been a fact, because of the general condition of the country, the capitalization of these banks would have had to be much less than it is today. It would have been impossible under the financial conditions as they were and as they continued down to very recent months for those banks to supply adequate capital. What is the rule in regard to this? The Comptroller of the Currency, as a general proposition, rules that the capital of a bank ought to be at least one-tenth of the total amount of the deposits, this being the margin of safety, and the Department favors a more stringent rule. If this Government capital had not been supplied, our banks would be much weaker. If they could have supplied a meager but legally sufficient capital, it would be far less capital than they have at the present time. What would have been the result upon the taxing authorities throughout the country? It would have been just what one of the most able citizens who has appeared before our committee testified, and I am speaking now of the testimony of the man who discovered the situation which enabled the State of Maryland to tax Reconstruction Finance Corporation preferred stock in national banks, Mr. Leser, the chairman of the Maryland State Tax Commission. I am going to quote his language. He said that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had not gone into the State of Maryland, had not supplied capital to the Baltimore National Bank and the other banks in Maryland, that the common-stock holders would not be paying as much taxes today as they are and Maryland would be getting much less tax return.

He brought out very clearly that the program of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation supplying money to these banks at the rate of $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent enabled the common stock to reach a taxation value far above what it would have been had the R. F. C. not gone into the Baltimore situation.

Quoting from the hearings before us 2 or 3 days ago, I read the following:

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Excepting the $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent that goes to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; outside of that, the profit the bank makes goes to the common-stock holders. Now, the net result of this is that the common stock goes up in value by reason of the investment that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has in the preferred stock, doesn't it?

Mr. LESER. Yes; it does.

What is the logical result of that? The tax is based not upon the par value of the common stock, as the gentleman from Texas many times asserted, but it is based on the value of the stock. By giving the bank a low rate of interest—that is what it amounts to, $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent upon the preferred stock—the common stock earns a greater dividend, and if it earns a greater dividend it has a greater value. If the State tax commission is on its job, as it was in Maryland, and as the tax commissions are in most of the States, then the increase is reflected in an increased tax valuation upon that common stock.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. In the gentleman's study of this question has he found an instance where the capital stock of a bank has ever been taxed by a State taxing authority at less than its par value?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Does the gentleman mean at more than its par value?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; at less than its par value.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Oh, yes; a great many instances.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman can cite me one case I would like to have it.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I cannot cite the gentleman to any particular bank, but I know there are many instances.

I may say that the State tax commission is bound by the law of its State; and if the bank stock was worth less than par, as literally millions of shares of stock were during the depression, then they would be assessed at less than par, and they were.

Mr. MURDOCK. But is it not a fact that no bank in operation would dare tell the taxing authorities that their capital stock was worth less than par and ask to be taxed on that lowered value?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Oh, yes. Practically all bank stock in the State of Michigan has deducted from it the real-estate value, which brings the stock in a great many instances below par.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, an expert on tax matters, having been a member and chairman of the State Tax Commission of Illinois for some years.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not claim that honor; but I may say in answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] that as chairman of the Tax Commission of Illinois for a period of 2 years I believe I understand what the law is there. We assessed the bank stock at the fair cash value of that stock, not the par value.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not a fact that the preferred stock taken by the R. F. C. in these banks is in the nature of a loan?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. DONDERO. That stock is not a permanent investment but has to be returned or repaid at the rate of 5 percent a year?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. Chairman, I want to quote what the chairman of the Maryland Tax Commission says about the proposition that Maryland is getting just as much, if not more, because of the rise in the value of the common stock occasioned by the low dividend or interest rate charged upon preferred stock:

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. You are now getting more taxes out of common-stock holders than you would have gotten had the Reconstruction Finance Corporation not made its investments in these various financial institutions in Maryland; is that not true?

Mr. LESER. I think very likely it is so.

Mr. Chairman, that is the statement of the man who brought about this situation. That is the statement of the man who brought this suit in behalf of the State of Maryland. He says that Maryland is actually better off, getting more taxes, today by reason of this investment than if there had been no change in the law.

In connection with the proposition that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] brings up, do not forget that if we permit this kind of taxation to be had, it will be the first time in the history of any tax authority of any State or of the Nation itself that a tax is based upon a liability and not upon an asset.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it cannot be denied that this preferred stock is in the nature of a liability. Before the common-stock holders can get anything this preferred stock must be paid in full. Before they can get anything by way of dividends a $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent dividend rate must be paid. It is a liability of the common-stock holders and not an asset. Where is the logic in taxing the liability of a bank?

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion may I say that no one need think for one moment that anyone other than the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to pay this tax. There is a definite 5-year contract entered into between the Corporation and the banks to the effect that the rate shall be $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent and bank stock in no State in the Union is assessed to any person other than the owner of the stock. The Government of the United States will pay this tax, if this bill is not passed. [Applause.]

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sisson] 5 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems quite evident that the failure on a former occasion by this House to pass the legislation to accomplish substantially the same purpose as this bill is intended to accomplish was due, in some part, to the fact that many of the Members did not at that time understand all of the facts involved in the legislation and in the situation. I think that will be evident from the debate on this same bill in the other body of the Congress on February 24 and the debate on the other bill in the House on February 25. As appears therefrom, it was not clearly understood, either in the other body or in the House. The other body, however, did pass the legislation that was before it at that time or, in other words, this bill S. 3978. The facts and the law, as well as the equities of the situation, seemed so clear at that time to the House Banking and Currency Committee, which had unanimously reported the other bill, that probably our committee made the mistake of not clearly getting all of the facts and the equities before this House at that time.

In the brief time allotted to me on this bill I do not expect to be able to cover the whole subject. There are several members of our committee, however, both on the Democratic and Republican side, who can and will do this in a more capable manner than I; and I am sure, if the Members take pains to listen to all of the remarks from the several members of the Banking and Currency Committee, or if they will take the pains to read the debate in the other body on this same bill on February 24 and the debate in the House on the other bill on February 25, they can arrive at only one conclusion, and that is that this bill should be passed.

For the benefit of those who may not have the opportunity or time to read the former debates, I shall attempt to cover very briefly the more important facts and provisions of law that are involved in this legislation.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created by Congress in January 1932 as an agency through which the Federal Government might act in the emergency then existing to save from ruin the banking structure of the country and certain great industries and financial institutions, such as not only the banks but the insurance companies and railroads. It was not intended, as has been claimed, to be solely or principally in the interest of the big bankers or of our wealthy classes. I am not now, and I never have been, connected with any bank, railroad, or insurance company either as an officer or as an attorney, except as most trial lawyers do, from time to time, receive employment from so-called casualty and surety companies to defend negligence and surety cases. I have never had a retainer or been on the pay roll in any way of any of those institutions except as I might have been employed and paid on a per-diem basis to try a few cases. I have no criticism of lawyers who—perhaps more fortunate than I—have had such connections, and it is the purest kind of demagoguery to attack them by reason of such connections alone and call them "bankers' advocates." On the other hand, I have joined with several of the men who have long served on the House Banking and Currency Committee, such as the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] and others, in advocating and fighting for the measures to which most of the big bankers were opposed, such as Federal insurance of bank deposits and control by the Government rather than by the private bankers of our money and credit.

This bill is not a bankers' bonus bill nor a bill in the interest of bankers, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] incorrectly claimed in the former debate in this House, and by which he possibly thereby misled some of the Members of the House. It is not reasonable or fair or for the general welfare to claim that because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has taken measures necessary to save some of these institutions that that was not a necessary thing to do for all the people. The alternative was for the Government either to let many of these institutions go down in ruin or else for the Federal Government to take them over. We could not afford to allow this blow to fall upon the holders of insurance policies, the people whose small savings were invested in insurance companies, the small depositors of the banks, nor were we prepared to adopt the other alternative of Government ownership. I am speaking of this because I most sincerely believe that it is not right to arouse emotions and prejudice, and I also believe and know that if the Members of this House decide this question by their judgment and common sense, and not by emotions or prejudices, the bill will pass.

It is true that at the time that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created by Congress in 1932, Congress did not contemplate all of the kinds of relief and aid to business and commerce and industry that we have since, by additions to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law in 1933 and 1934 and 1935, authorized to be done.

By the Emergency Banking Act of March 9, 1933, Congress authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to furnish aid to the banks of the country that needed such aid, both national banks and State banks, by subscribing to the preferred stock of the national banks and then by subscribing to the preferred stock of State banks and trust companies in those States wherein such State banks and trust companies were authorized to issue preferred stock and wherein the legislatures should remove the double liability provision from stockholders. With respect to the State banks and trust companies which either were not authorized to issue preferred stock or in States wherein the legislatures did not remove the stockholders' double liability provision, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was authorized to furnish aid to such banks by taking their capital notes or debentures.

It is not in accordance with the facts to say—as was said in the other debate—that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could compel either a national bank or a State bank to receive such aid against its will. With respect to the national banks and the member banks, that control was in the Treasury Department—in the Comptroller of the Currency, and it was only in the cases where the Treasury found that the banks needed such additional capital, either to repair their impaired stock or to continue to fulfill their functions in their respective communities or generally to build up their capital structure, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could take the preferred stock of the national banks, member banks. With respect to the State banks and trust companies which were nonmembers, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could not come in and aid those banks unless and until the banking authority of the given State had found, for one of the reasons which I have mentioned, that such aid was needed. It is true, of course, that prior to the bank holiday and of the passage of the Emergency Banking Act of 1933, loans were made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to various banks in the country, and while some mistakes may have been made—I do not claim to be competent to pass upon that—the purpose was to save them from failure, to preserve industry, to prevent further loss and unemployment, which would have resulted had they been allowed to go down. That is now water over the dam.

There are few calamities that can happen to either a city, a village, or any community which affect more widely all of the people in that community, whether bank depositors, business men, farmers, or people who work in mills and factories, than the failure of the bank or banks in those particular communities. It was the purpose of the Government to save those which could be salvaged, which were at heart still sound, and so far as possible by aiding in the reorganization, in securing new capital—private capital, if possible—from the people of the community, or if not, by furnishing aid through this splendid arm of the Government, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to repair as rapidly as possible the terrible damage that had been done to the banking structure of the country and to build up fortifications and safeguards against a repetition of such loss. It was to that end that we passed the Federal deposit insurance law, and as most of the Members of the House remember, we had opposed to us pretty generally the big bankers, and we had to put those measures through against the most formidable opposition which they could create against us.

It is very unfair and not in accordance with the history of the past 3 years to say now that our efforts were for, or mainly for the relief or aid of the big bankers and the big financial institutions. They were for their aid in the instances wherein—if that aid had not been extended—the crushing loss would have fallen most heavily upon those least able to bear it.

To this end the Reconstruction Finance Corporation furnished capital to the banks, both national and State, and in order to make it as easy as possible to rebuild such weak banks and to get the banks back in a position where they could and would commence fulfilling their normal functions as well as to make the burden upon the Federal Treasury a burden which, in the end, falls upon the taxpayers of the country, directly or indirectly, as light as possible, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has, from time to time, lowered the rate of interest upon its loans so furnished to the banks. Starting out at, I believe, 6 percent, it has finally been lowered to $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent for both national and State banks. The preferred stock of the banks, national and State, now held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, pays that rate of interest. So do the capital notes and debentures of the State banks held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bear the same rate.

Of course, all of the money which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has used and will use for loans to National and State banks, now amounting at the present time to about \$870,000,000, came from the Federal Treasury, from the taxpayers of this country, directly or indirectly. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation pays the Treasury for that money $2\frac{3}{4}$ percent. According to the experience of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the overhead expense of carrying on this function of loaning to the banks is about one-half of 1 percent. This leaves the very small margin of one-fourth of 1 percent for losses. The debentures and capital notes of the State banks which the R. F. C. holds for loans made to them being obligations, debts of those banks, are not taxable by either the State or local governments. They are liabilities, not assets. Neither are they taxable, of course, by the Federal Government. Neither is the capital stock of State banks and trust companies taxable by the Federal Government, nor have we any power, of course, to tax those assets. It was unquestionably the intention of Congress in the act of January 22, 1932, creating the R. F. C., to exempt from State and local taxation all of the property of the R. F. C. except real property, for the reason that the R. F. C. is a nonprofit corporation and simply an arm of the Government. To tax its property, including the preferred stock of the banks which it holds for the loans made to those banks, which preferred stock is a liability of the banks and not an asset, is exactly the same thing as taxing property belonging to the people of the United States and coming from the taxpayers, directly or indirectly. The Supreme Court held, of course, in the recent decision that the language in the act of January 22, 1932, was not sufficiently broad so as expressly to exempt such preferred stock from taxation. The taking of preferred stock by the R. F. C. was not, at that time, contemplated and had not been authorized. It is to cure that inadvertent omission or gap that this bill is necessary.

Nor is this removing from State or local taxation any property or revenue which either the States or subdivisions thereof have formerly been able to tax. In only one instance, so far as I know, has a levy been made; but no tax has been paid or collected on such preferred stock by any State or subdivision thereof. Such preferred stock simply represents money put into the bank by the Government. The stock is an obligation of the bank and not an asset. On the other hand, this aid to the banks by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has, in the great majority of instances, greatly increased, sometimes several fold, the value of the common stock of the banks, and thereby, to that extent, increased the amount of property available for State and local taxation. In practically all of the States, property, including stock—which has its situs for taxation, of course, at the place of the bank—is assessed and pays taxes upon its actual value rather than at its par value. In other words, if the stock is worth 300 percent of its par value it is assessed and taxed on that basis. And if there is any State which does not so assess and tax it, it is the fault of the taxing authorities of that State—not of the Federal Government.

My friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has several times claimed that in Texas such stock is assessed only at its par value, but our very able colleague upon the Banking and Currency Committee, Mr. CROSS, of the same State, disputes this and says there is no reason why it should not be as-essed and taxed at its actual value in Texas as in other States.

Now further, as to what would be the effect: If this bill is not passed and if the States and municipalities are allowed to tax the preferred stock held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as an agency of the Government for the loans that it has made to the national banks, preferred stock of State banks held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not so taxable; capital notes and debentures of State banks are not so taxable; the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is obliged, as I have already pointed out, to take the preferred stock for its loans from the State banks in the States where such banks are allowed to issue such preferred stock and wherein the double liability provision upon stockholders has been removed. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is allowed to take capital notes and debentures from those State banks only where those two conditions do not obtain.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] claims that this bill is for the aid of the bankers. I deny it.

He claims that the tax which this gap in the law would now allow if this bill is not passed would not have to be paid ultimately by the R. F. C. or by the Treasury, or by the taxpayers of this country, directly or indirectly, but that it could be passed on to the banks. I deny it. And I want you to pay particular attention and follow the gentleman in his very skillful argument and see if he has told you wherein and how the tax can be passed on.

The only witness who appeared before our committee in support of the position of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the only witness who appeared in opposition to the bill we have before us today, except Mr. PATMAN, was the gentleman who was mentioned, I believe, by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], Judge Leser, of Maryland, a great taxing authority, and he was attempting to sustain and bolster up the position of Mr. PATMAN, because Maryland had received what would be, if this bill were not passed, an unconscionable advantage over all the other States. I asked him this question:

Mr. Sisson. Judge, may I ask you one question, and I think I can say that the committee here is interested in this: Can you show us how, if a tax laid by a State brings the expense of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation up to more than the $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent which it charges the banks, that extra money—that is, I am including the $2\frac{3}{4}$ percent that they have to pay the Treasury and the overhead expense for that part of the function and their small margin, which is estimated to be about one-fourth of 1 percent for losses—if the tax laid by a State upon these shares brings that up to more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent, I want to ask you if that extra amount does not fall—has to be taken out of the Treasury of the United States and, therefore, does not fall upon the taxpayers of the United States, directly and indirectly? That is the question I am interested in.

Mr. LESER. Yes; that is a fact. It is a question of who should it fall upon, the Federal Government or the State government?

This gentleman was produced by Mr. PATMAN to support his position and he was the only witness who appeared before the committee in opposition to the bill, except Mr. PATMAN himself. Judge Leser, of course, was also interested as representing the State of Maryland which, if Mr. PATMAN succeeded in preventing the passage of this bill, would have been given an unfair advantage over all the other States in the Union.

This preferred stock of the national banks held by the R. F. C. is not privately held. It is not in the hands of private stockholders. It belongs to the Government of the United States. The R. F. C. cannot, for 5 years, under its contract and according to the resolution of its board of directors, increase the rate of interest or dividend upon such preferred stock. It already has only a margin of about one-fourth of 1 percent for losses. Rates of State and local taxation combined vary in the United States anywhere from a fraction of 1 percent up to as high as 10 percent. It has been computed fairly that the average is about $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent, which would at the present time be laid upon this preferred stock held by the R. F. C. If this bill does not pass, however, there is nothing to prevent the States and municipalities from increasing their rates of taxation, and there will be a race and wild scramble in many instances wherein the more aggressive and selfish States and municipalities—the ones who are continually coming to Uncle Sam for aid—will try to get in ahead of the others and try to get at this new source of revenue. Assume that the average tax is $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent. The R. F. C. already pays $2\frac{3}{4}$ percent, has an expense of one-half of 1 percent and a margin for losses of one-fourth of 1 percent. This will bring it upon the average up to 6 percent, $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent of which the R. F. C. will have to draw out of the Federal Treasury.

The unfairness, the inequity, the discrimination, are all apparent, it seems to me, upon the face of it. Take my own State of New York, which is one of the States—and there are, I believe, 16 others—which do not tax bank stock. Our legislature recognized that the preferred stock of the national banks taken by the R. F. C. for loans made was an obligation of the banks and not an asset or subject even to computation in taxing the income of the banks, as we do in New York. Let me quote you from the New York statute passed March 16, 1935:

All interest paid or accrued during the year on indebtedness, and all dividends paid during the year on preferred stock held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, shall be deducted in determining the net income.

But I am not so much concerned about this because it is unfair to the State of New York or because it is a discrimination against that State. That is only one of the many unwise and unfair and inequitable things involved in this situation if we do not pass this bill. There are, in various parts of the country, many States other than the State of New York, as we are informed by the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Mr. Crowley, where there are banks that are still in danger—banks whose capital structure must be improved if they are to retain the benefits, the security, the safeguards of Federal deposit insurance. New loans made to such banks—if this bill does not pass—will necessarily have to bear a much higher rate of interest than is now borne by the others, who were in equally or greater need of assistance and between whom and the R. F. C. there is now a contract that the money shall cost them only $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent. To that extent the situation will be much more precarious in many communities, in many States in this country, by reason of the greater difficulty in building up perhaps the only bank in that community, upon which the business life, the industry of that community, is dependent.

Many of the things which I have mentioned here are so elementary that it seems almost an insult to the intelligence of the House to speak of them. However, there has been so much misunderstanding and so many false issues injected into this discussion on the former occasion when we debated similar legislation, such as the powers of the States, State rights, and bankers' profits, that I have done it at the risk of seeming to lecture.

There is one other thing about which there seems to me to be some misunderstanding. Much has been said, both in this House and in the other body, about the R. F. C. making a profit in these matters and whether an advantage should be given to the R. F. C. over private stockholders who put their money in in communities to salvage banks in reorganization of such banks. The R. F. C. is, of course, an emergency and not a permanent institution. At least we hope so. And when and if the need for the R. F. C. has been met and banks and private industry can take up, as we hope they will, what then will become of the assets, property, surplus, and profits of the R. F. C.? Why, of course, the R. F. C. has to liquidate; and its property, surplus, assets, and profits will go back to the Treasury and thereby to the taxpayers of this country, direct and indirect, where they came from. That is all there is to it.

It is my position and the position of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee, as I understand, unanimously, Democrats and Republicans alike, that we urge upon this House that this is a matter which we must look at from a national point of view, and by reason of that we should pass this bill to remove the inequity and discrimination resulting from the present inadvertent omission in the law. It is to that national point of view—the point of view which every Member of Congress on both sides of this House presumably holds—above every other consideration—the general welfare of the country—that I address myself.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McFARLANE. The members of the Banking and Currency Committee in favor of this bill have consumed 153 minutes, and the opposition only 26 minutes. Under the rules of the House, cannot the opposition have an equal division of time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. Under the rule adopted the time for debate was equally divided between the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHANNON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. SHANNON. I rise to appeal to the bankers and near bankers to give the opposition an equal division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the time is being controlled by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. REILLY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, those who oppose this bill have made every argument on the theory that the Federal Government, through its agent, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has entered into divers and sundry financial arrangements in the various States upon a competition basis with private interests.

I do not think the gentlemen believe that, but, nevertheless, when one considers the argument they have made, he can reach no other conclusion.

We all know that the Federal Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, went into the financial field solely for emergency reasons, to preserve the financial stability and integrity of the various communities throughout the United States.

I want to call the attention of Members of the House to one patent instance in the Midwest where a bank was just about to fail, and, in my judgment, would have failed had it not been for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

This beneficent arm of the Government purchased $50,000,000 of preferred stock in 1933, and at that time the bank had $75,000,000 in common stock. After the purchase the common stock was reduced from $75,000,000 to $25,000,000. The common stock about that time had an aggregate value of about $30,000,000. That is the value at which the common stock would have been assessed by the taxing commission of the State in which the bank was located.

Since that time that common stock has doubled in value by the recovery in the bank's assets and from the earnings, and as a result the bank is now paying approximately twice as much in taxes on the common stock as it did in 1933 because of the increased value of that common stock.

Now, following that theory a little further, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had not gone to the assistance of the financial institution, I undertake to say that that institution would have failed; and that would have resulted in the depositors of that institution taking anywhere from 10 to 30 percent on the dollar of the money they had deposited therein.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation gave to the depositors of that institution dollar for dollar. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation saved the directors and the stockholders of that institution from the double-liability assessment. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation also saved at least 75 other banks in and about that community which would have failed had this bank closed at that particular time. The financial independence of community after community was saved by the benevolence and charity of the Federal Government, and how anyone at this time would attempt to tax the goose that laid the golden egg for the hundreds of unfortunate financial institutions is more than I can comprehend. It seems to me so irrational and absurd to lay a tax on the stock now owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that the proposition deserves little or no attention. This purported taxation is utterly unfair. It would violate every cardinal virtue of equity. We have made much ado about nothing, in my humble opinion. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Missouri 5 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose at this late hour there can be nothing new said on this bill, but there are certain things, it seems to me, we ought to agree to. There are certain fundamental facts in this case about which there ought not to be any dispute by anybody. In the first place, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation holds three classes of securities for its investment in the banks of the country—preferred stock in national banks, preferred stock in State banks, and capital notes in State banks. There is not the dotting of an "i" difference between them, and the first proposition I ask is, why should the States be permitted to tax the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's holdings of preferred stock in national banks, when they do not have the right to tax the stock held by the State banks and they cannot tax the capital notes issued by the State banks, which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is holding for exactly the same kind of loan in each instance. Gentlemen talk about discrimination. Why tax the stock that is held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in national banks, when exactly the same kind of stock which they hold of State banks is not subject to taxation, and why tax the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's holdings of preferred stock in national banks when you do not tax and are not permitted to tax the capital notes and debentures held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in State banks? I do not think anybody will dispute that proposition. That is the situation we are in. Not only that, but why should you tax the preferred stock held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in national banks when the preferred stock it holds in insurance companies of the country is not taxed, and why submit this particular class of stock to taxation when we do not tax a single one of the notes or bonds or mortgages or debentures held to secure loans made to railroads of the country? There is no reason why we should now pass a law subjecting to taxation this particular class of preferred stock. I challenge any man to show a single item outside of real estate held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that is subject to taxation under the law as it is now. Why should we tax stock held as security by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of national banks, when we do not tax the capital notes or the preferred stock of State banks, or the securities of insurance companies and do not tax a single mortgage or note or debenture the Reconstruction Finance Corporation holds as security for the loans made to the railroads and industrial concerns of the country. Is there a man on this floor or anyone else who can differentiate between them? It has not been done so far.

There is not a single governmental agency, not a single instrumentality of Government, that is taxed. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has been pronounced in his opposition to this bill. He represents the great State of Texas, or a part of it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] has been against the bill, and he represents the agricultural interests. I call attention to the fact that starting back in 1923 we wrote into the law an exemption for every asset, outside of real estate, held by the Federal land banks of the country. Not one of the mortgages held by the Federal land banks as security for loans to farmers of the country is subject to taxation. Take the Federal Farm Mortgage Co. that is making loans to farmers of this country, take the intermediate-credit banks, take the central bank for cooperatives, as well as the regional banks and the Production Credit Corporation, which have been extending every form and character of loans to the farmers of the country. There is not a single dollar of their assets, including the mortgages they hold as security for loans they made, that is subject to taxation by the Nation or States. I ask you, Why pick out this particular stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that is held in national banks of this country and make it subject to taxation when all the property, assets, funds, and securities of all Government lending agencies are exempt from taxation? It is the only one. I challenge anybody to show that there is a dollar of the assets of a single lending agency of the Government that is subject to taxation by State or local authorities.

Now, coming over to the home-loan activities, if you please, the home-loan bank was established in 1932. We wrote into that law an absolute exemption, not only of its capital, not only of its surplus and reserves, but an exemption against all advances that it made to the institutional members in order that they might be passed on to the home-lending agencies to bring relief to the home owners of this country.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not now. Then coming farther on down, we created the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in order to help the needy home owners of this country. We wrote into that act a provision that none of the loans which they made, none of the securities which they have, none of the debentures or notes which they took as security for their loans should be subject to taxation either by Federal or State Governments.

Now, the gentleman has talked about the camel getting its nose under the tent. He has talked about precedent, and he talks about this being a bad precedent. Whether it is right or wrong, for a period of at least 12 or 13 years under the administration of both parties, we have adopted that as a national policy. That is, to exempt from taxation by local authorities all agencies which are engaged in lending money to revive the country, to help the home owners, to help the railroads, to help insurance companies, to help the banks. Now, we hear a great howl here about the fact that we are trying to exempt from taxation some $225,000,000 held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the preferred stocks of the national banks of this country. I repeat that there is no man on this floor who can show any difference between this security that is held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans they have made to the national banks and the stock that is held by them where they made loans to State banks. There is not any difference between those and loans made on capital notes to the State banks. There is not any difference between those and loans made to the insurance companies of this country. There is not any difference between those loans and the loans that have been made to finance the farmers of this country, and there is not any difference between those loans and loans that have been made to finance the home owners of this country to preserve a shelter for themselves and their families. Yet not a dollar of those assets in the hands of any of these lending agencies is subject to taxation either by the Federal Government or by the State government. They talk about the camel getting its nose under the tent. They are straining at a gnat and they have already swallowed the camel. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply appreciative of this very unlimited generosity in the amount of time that the gentlemen of the committee have so kindly given to us of the opposition. Under the rule adopted we have 4 hours' debate, and, under the rules of the House, the time in debate on the floor is supposed to be divided equally between those for and against a measure. However, on this bill the time on both sides of the aisle has largely been given to those favoring the bill. This makes now 31 minutes for the opposition as against 174 minutes which the proponents of the bill have had. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Only two members of the opposition have sought time at this desk until the time had all been allotted.

Mr. McFARLANE. I know that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY] has said he wanted time. I do not know whom he asked. I know he asked on the Republican side. I know the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, said he wanted time. I do not know whom he went to see.

The acting chairman of the committee, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, spoke at length yesterday, but I notice his speech is not in the RECORD this morning, so we are deprived of the benefit of the statements he made.

Mr. REILLY. I said until the time was all allotted.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am sorry I do not have time to yield further. Let me say, however, I asked for time yesterday when we started the consideration of this bill and Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's list of requests were very short on the paper before him.

I should like to consider some of the arguments that have been made on the floor by those in favor of this bill. It looks as though this bill has nine lives. The House, after considering this same bill, H. R. 11047, on February 25, defeated same by a record vote of 165 to 173. It is like the black cat. We kill it once, but it comes right back. Under the rules of most any State legislature when you kill a bill in either house the same bill cannot again be considered by either house during the remainder of that session. And this is the first time I have heard of either House of Congress taking up and considering the same bill again after it has been defeated during the same session.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me briefly call attention to this fact: The privileges that are asked under this bill have never been previously given by any Congress. Since 1864 the different States have had three different ways of taxing bank stocks: First, by taxing the shares; second, by including dividends derived therefrom in the taxable income of an owner or holder thereof; third, by taxing the income of the bank. There has been a lot said about discrimination. I wish I had time to go into the many discriminations that this piece of legislation will set up.

When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was created in 1932 the national banks did not have the power to issue preferred stock, nor did the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have the power to purchase same. This power was created in the banking legislation rushed through Congress in 1933. There was nothing in this legislation exempting preferred stock in national banks from taxation, and the Supreme Court, in a well-written opinion last month, unanimously so held that all shares of national banks no matter by whom owned shall be subject to taxation.

Now this bill exempts the preferred stock of national banks held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from all taxation, National, State, county, municipal, or local from any taxes, past, present, or future. It does not take a Philadelphia lawyer to understand those provisions, and certainly the 31 States who have elected under the above-quoted section 5219 of the R. C. S. U. S. to tax national banks' stock upon their shares of stock realize that the enactment of this law will work a hardship on the State banks and the national banks, not having any of their stock sold to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who must pay full taxes based upon their capitalization plus their pro-rata part of the taxes that must be assessed because of the exemption of the bank stock sold by his competitors to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include certain excerpts. I will not have time to cover everything.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court decision in the Maryland case has held what has been the law all the time, very clearly, that preferred stock in these national banks was subject to taxation by State authorities. It is a peculiar thing that all of the proponents of this legislation come here and argue that this bill does not exempt anybody from taxation; that the values are there and they are increased. We have heard a lot about that, but Mr. Jones in his statement in the hearings very clearly shows by tables which he gave this committee, which I inserted in yesterday's RECORD, that if you do not pass this bill the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is going to have to pay on the $229,209,420.33 in preferred stock in these banks which they own, $5,512,736.38. He says further he has agreed to buy over $100,000,000 more of stock, and if this bill is passed it is going to have to require the State and local taxing authorities to hunt up about two and a half million dollars more taxes from the people owning property in the localities where these different banks have sold their stock to the R. F. C.

COMMITTEE HAS ITS NECK BOWED

Now, this is something I am not able to understand. If I am incorrectly advised about the situation, I should like to have it cleared up. As I understand it, Mr. Jones went to the committee and asked the committee to accept the amendments that would strike out this preferred stock and clear up this situation so that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could get out from under this proposition and pass it back to the respective States as it has always been since 1864, so that the State and local taxing authorities could take charge as they have always had charge.

But the Banking Committee refused to accept these amendments. They have had their necks bowed. I do not know why the committee refuses and fails to follow the suggestions and advice of Mr. Jones, the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It seems to me that if the Chairman of the R. F. C. is perfectly willing and asks this committee and this Congress to allow him to transfer his preferred stock or trade it into securities that will permit the State taxing authorities to tax this stock—notes or debentures—the R. F. C. will not be hurt, they will not be out any taxes. Adopt these amendments and the bill will then pass this back to the State and local taxing authorities.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot entertain the request. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, since the Congress last year, in response to a national demand for some type of neutrality legislation, undertook the consideration of this important subject, the question has been uppermost in the public mind. Members of the Congress, and especially the Foreign Relations Committee, have devoted much time and intelligent study to this most far-reaching question. In view of the acute situation abroad, the subject continues to be a live one. This is as it should be, because it involves, if indeed it does not threaten, the very welfare of the nationals of this country. The law on this subject of neutrality, which was enacted at the last session and reenacted at this one, provides in substance, in brief, for two major prohibitions: First, an absolute and complete embargo upon the exports of this country of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to belligerent countries; second, it carries a prohibition against the carrying of arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare to warring nations in American vessels. It likewise contains two restrictions, which, in my opinion, are minor in the severity of their provisions so far as the economic welfare of our citizenship is concerned. The first of these restrictions provides that belligerents, as to whom the United States is neutral, shall not have the use of the ports of this country for their submarines, and that, likewise, these ports must not be used as a base for supplying the belligerent ships of such countries with arms, ammunition, and the implements of war. The second of these provisions places a restraint upon our own citizens in an effort to prevent their traveling upon belligerent vessels.

One here at the Nation's Capital comes into contact daily with the Senators and Representatives of the several States, who are giving so abundantly of their time and thought to this question and cannot fail to observe an ever manifest undercurrent of dissatisfaction with the present legislation. And we often hear on the floor of the Congress open expressions and read from the current press that the legislation is totally inadequate for the purpose sought, namely, peace in this country and an affirmative effort to prevent our being dragged into another world war.

Mr. Chairman, there is an adage to the effect that in times of peace we should prepare for war. I should like to paraphrase this for the purpose of this discussion and say, "In times of peace, prepare for peace." With Europe a veritable volcano of war at present, with the war clouds of another gigantic war, the like of which possibly the world has never heretofore witnessed, hanging the lowest on the world's horizon, with the diplomatic endeavors of the Old World statesmen daily changing into kaleidoscopic patterns, with the whole of Europe jockeying for position, it must be manifest, even to him who reasons as he runs, that the enemy of civilization and Christianity, the all-powerful god of war, is busy about his task. War is imminent. Just how far distant it is no man can successfully predict. It may be 6 months; it may be 2 years. At the most it cannot be more than 5 years unless something not now apparent develops. In my opinion, conditions in the world today from the standpoint of imminence of another world war are more pronounced than they were 6 months before an all-powerful German war machine rode roughshod over Belgium in 1914. If you question the wisdom of this statement, I would point out to you the fact that today a powerful, militaristic Italy, under the domination of the war lord, Mussolini, bent upon expansion and conquest, is running at liberty over a weaker and almost defenseless black people in Ethiopia. The yellow race of Japan for the past decade, under the domination of the war lords of that nation, has been continually building up a powerful military machine, likewise bent upon a conquest of expansion. Russia looks with uneasy expression and apprehensive eyes upon this program of Japan. The Chinese, powerful in potentiality but defenseless in reality, resent keenly and with a smoldering fire of national pride this aggression on the part of her neighboring, but more powerful, yellow race. To the west the mighty British lion paces uneasily but, withal, cunningly and wisely as he watches over his spreading dominions and counts the effect of these aggressive and hostile acts on his own proud kingdom. The ingenuous and resourceful Germany, under the leadership of the new war lord of that country, has boldly discounted the Locarno Pact and proclaimed the last vestige of the Treaty of Versailles as but another scrap of paper. France is diligent in her efforts to form new alliances and is emotionally appealing to her neighbors and the other civilized countries to rally to her support in defending the Locarno Pact and the Treaty of Versailles. America, the New World giant, once far removed from Europe, but now, as a result of scientific advancements in communication and transportation, not so far removed from the Old World; America—a peace-loving nation, in spite of its suffering from a worldwide depression, with no necessity for expansion, no desire for conquest; rich and happy in its own ideals of government—is wont to remain aloof from the turmoil and maelstrom of Old World diplomacy and warfare. The question uppermost, therefore, in the minds of those of us selected by 126,000,000 peace-loving Americans to represent them in the National Congress is neutrality; those of us who were entrusted with the important task of enacting legislation that will, in the first instance, contribute to the continuation and improvement of the welfare of these 126,000,000 people and, at the same time, see to it that they are not embroiled in an unnecessary warfare, the antithesis of contentment and peace, cannot lightly pass over this momentous question of neutrality.

The all-important question now is what is America going to do about it. What course shall we pursue? Mr. Chairman, as I see it, we are confronted with two alternate problems—an economic one and one of peace. There are those in this country who belong to the school of thought that advocates the enrichment of this country economically at the expense of world peace, including the peace of this country. The members of this school of thought, among whom are numbered the munition and arms makers, would have us manufacture every conceivable contraband of war and export this to any and all belligerents. They argue that this would bring about a return of prosperity to this country that would excel even that of 1914 to 1919; that it would reduce, if not entirely annihilate, unemployment. I cannot subscribe to this doctrine. If the recent investigation of the senatorial body that investigated this matter can be relied upon, these same proponents advocated the same thing with the result that we were brought into the last World War. This preachment means, at the most, if followed, that this country would become prosperous as a result of the innocent blood that always flows on the battlefields and the tears that come from weeping eyes of loved ones. This doctrine is conceived in greed and born in intrigue. It is repulsive to the teachings of Christianity and civilization.

Again, there are those who belong to another school of thought. They advocate peace at any price. To them the flag is but a piece of colorful bunting. Their doctrine is that of the pacifist, which is beautiful in theory but impractical in a sinful world which, unfortunately, does not practice the Golden Rule. This latter doctrine, if followed, could lead to but one end—the devastation of this rich country, with the eventual enslavement of its people, whose heritage is repugnant to this false doctrine.

Somewhere there must be a sane, sound policy for this country to pursue. To my conception there is but one answer—armed neutrality. We can be neutral, but we must be strong enough to demand the respect of those warlike nations who profess a desire for peace and at the same time are, with wanton abandonment, bent upon a policy of economic expansion and aggression.

Is it necessary for me to point out to my colleagues here that treaties, pacts, and agreements are worthless in a world of nations who are arming to the limit of their economic ability; when aggression and expansion are the ultimate desires of so many nations of the world? Is it necessary to call your attention to the fact that a peaceful overture of one powerful nation to another today is withdrawn almost before an opportunity for its acceptance has been given? The order of procedure among the nations of the world today is so selfish and so self-centered that one is reminded of a public auction where the highest bidder is the purchaser of the thing sought. A powerful nation through its diplomatic circles issues a strong denunciation today of the encroachment upon the national rights of a weaker nation. A few months later the same powerful nation, when it is either to the economic or strategic interest of that nation to do so, barter or negotiates with the same nation that it has so recently denounced. We have seen treaties, pacts, and agreements thrown overboard, apparently without rhyme or reason other than that might makes right. Apparently, therefore, we are driven to the conclusion that, however desirable and beautiful are world courts, leagues of nations, and international agreements for disarmament in their theory, we are confronted, as peace loving as we are, with the realization that we are dealing with nations, who, like men, have as their controlling factor a selfish desire to prosper at the other fellow's expense.

In this situation are we not driven, driven reluctantly, but nevertheless driven, to a little selfish consideration of our own national preservation? Because of this unfortunate situation our Navy and our Army, and more especially our Navy, must be built up to the point where it will be excelled by none, not even that of Great Britain. Our vast shore lines and outlying possessions must be protected. American integrity and American nationality must be conserved. The heritage purchased by our glorious ancestry, with its institutions and its ideals, must be maintained. When Europe and the rest of the world has awakened to the truth that peace is precious and that the race in armaments and warfare must end, then—and not until then—can America afford to cease its vigilance.

I am confident that no one who is familiar with my record and utterances can rightfully challenge my fervent desire for peace—my hatred of war. National peace and an opportunity to pleasantly travel the road of peaceful pursuits is as zealously coveted by me as any pacifist in this country. I am in no sense a militarist—I abhor war. The memory of 1917 and 1918 is too fresh in my mind, as in yours, for me to be swept off my feet by either the siren song of the pacifist or the jingoism of false prophets of patriotism. Like the four-hundred-and-odd thousand patriotic American citizens in Mississippi whom I have the honor to represent, I am seeking a means and a policy to maintain that coveted but elusive peace.

The critics of this policy of armed neutrality point with alarm to the tremendous financial cost of maintaining a strong army and navy and attempt to argue the benefits that would flow from the expenditure of the same money in peaceful pursuits. With this argument we have no fault. This argument is academic. If it were humanly possible to convince the European war lords of the logic of the premises of this argument, this, indeed, would be a happy and warless world. But again we must remind ourselves that we are confronted with a present serious reality and condition not of our own choice, rather than a theoretical condition, however desirable and cherished. One might as well argue that a peace officer should not be armed when he attempts to combat a desperate criminal.

We are not unmindful of the fact that an adequate armed force for this country is an expensive necessity, costing as it does millions of dollars to maintain. Neither can we forget that our recent venture into the arena of the World War cost the taxpayers of this country in excess of $50,000,000,000 in money alone, and we have not seen the end yet. But of more moment still, where is the American home that did not feel more keenly the loss or injury of some loved one who was called upon to offer his blood upon the fields of horror in the hellishness of modern warfare?

For America the cost of that war is not yet paid, either in money or in blood. The veterans of that war, many of whom are maimed in body and mind, as well as the taxpayers, are still paying—and will pay for years to come. For them that war is not yet over.

Mr. Chairman, when I first came to Washington I felt it my patriotic duty to make a pilgrimage to historic Arlington Cemetery, just across the beautiful Potomac, and there at the Shrine of the Unknown Soldier to make my obeisance and pay my silent tribute to him whom a grateful America has honored as a symbol of the countless thousands of his comrades who, like himself, had made the supreme sacrifice on the altar of the god of war. There in the grim presence of this nameless hero my thoughts were of the necessity of peace. I verily hated war. A few days later I visited the tomb of one of America's greatest statesmen, a man who, by his early training, received in a Christian home, loved and craved peace above every other thing. There in a crypt in Bethlehem Chapel I stood awed in the presence of the tomb of the wartime President, the peerless Woodrow Wilson. My thoughts traveled back to the days of 1916, to those hectic days when Europe was afire with war and intrigue. I remembered then, as you recall now, his vain efforts to keep America neutral and the heroic efforts he made to keep us out of war. There before me in this beautiful cathedral lay the mortal remains of a great apostle of peace. Here lay all that was mortal of the man who, having failed in his noble efforts to keep this country out of war, had gone to Europe at the conclusion of the carnage to force his ideals of peace upon a belligerent world, with the commendable purpose of preventing the horrible spectacle of another great war, such as apparently is in the making today. But, alas, the greed for power and the lust for expansion and conquest of the world diplomats thwarted his plans, and Woodrow Wilson came home sick and disillusioned; another casualty of the war; an idealist crushed by his own ideals.

Not long since, Mr. Chairman, I visited Mount Vernon, the home of him who gave life to the Republic, the greatest patriot, possibly, of them all. I followed the winding brick walk down the slope of the hill until I stood in the majestic presence of the tomb of George Washington, nestling at the foot of the hill, surrounded and shaded by a beautiful copse of woods. I remembered with increasing pride and respect his patriotism, his valor, and his wisdom. There comes back to my mind, as it should be indelibly impressed upon the mind of every American patriot, the wisdom of his farewell message, delivered to the American people when he surrendered the portfolio of office and gracefully retired to private life.

From his wisdom, experience, and zeal for the welfare of the country he loved, he enjoined:

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all.

Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Mr. Chairman, let us in the present status of world affairs follow the advice of that great Patriot and Seer who sleeps at Mount Vernon. Let us maintain a policy of strict neutrality; live up to the letter and spirit of the neutrality law so recently enacted, and thereby serve notice upon a warring world that America desires peace; that she maintains a strict neutrality so long as she is allowed to pursue that course; but that by the means and methods of her perfected armed forces she here and now warns those who would break that peace with her that there will inevitably and surely be but one result, the annihilation of that aggressor. Then, and then alone, will we be able to maintain neutrality and enjoy coveted peace. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Ford] 5 minutes.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, the bill under discussion, S. 3978, is easily understood. Its purpose is twofold.

First. To exempt from taxation that particular class of preferred stock which the Congress authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to buy from national banks and from such State banks as were authorized by the laws of their States to issue preferred stock. The provision is clearly stated that the exemption shall apply only so long as the stock is held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The R. F. C. also took from banks where State laws prohibited preferred stock capital notes and debentures. These capital notes and debentures are generally conceded to be nontaxable. They bear the same rate of interest as the preferred stock—3½ percent—the difference being that in the case of the preferred stock it is called dividends. For all practical purposes stock, capital notes, and debentures are identical in all but name, and were devised for the same purpose, that of enabling the R. F. C. to stage a rescue party and one that has proved highly successful. For it has saved billions of dollars to bank depositors all over the Nation and has also preserved billions of taxable value to the States that would have been lost if the banks had not been saved and a general debacle prevented.

The second section of this bill provides that where the R. F. C. loans money to closed banks at 3½ percent the receivers of those banks must then reduce the interest on notes and other forms of debts owed the bank to a rate not to exceed 4½ percent.

This is entirely just and fair to our people who have borrowed money from banks now closed. If the debtor is manfully trying to meet his obligation, he should be given the benefit of lower rates of interest. To give the bank a low rate and permit the bank to exact from its debtors a high rate would be manifestly unjust. This section of the bill seeks to protect borrowers of closed banks.

When this bill was up some days ago it was opposed by some Members on the ground that it provided a new form of tax-exempt security. Study of the bill definitely disproves this statement.

Let me make this statement: This preferred stock not only is not a tax-exempt security but it is a security that has actually been responsible for the preservation of taxable wealth that otherwise would have been wiped out in the general deflation. In some instances it has created new taxable wealth.

A tax-exempt security is a form of obligation issued by National, State, or local Government. Regardless of who owns it, such a security is exempt from tax.

I hope the time will soon come when we shall cease to issue tax-exempt securities. This has nothing to do with the present bill because the preferred stock specified in the bill is tax exempt only so long as it is held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an agency of the United States Government. The specified securities were purchased by that Corporation, not for profit but solely to protect the people's deposits in banks. The exemption of these securities from taxation does not take from the States or other governmental subdivisions one dollar of taxable wealth. On the contrary, as before stated, the purchase by the R. F. C. of these securities has been the means of preserving for the States and other governmental subdivisions literally billions of dollars of taxable wealth.

Finally, the test is this: If the exemption from taxation is not made, who will pay the tax? The answer is: The R. F. C., which is an agency of the Federal Government. Therefore, it is the people of the United States who will pay this tax to such States as may choose to levy it if we fail to pass this bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, whenever a bill is reported by the Banking and Currency Committee a red herring seems to be drawn across the trail, and immediately the cry goes up that it is a bankers' bill. The Committee on Banking and Currency does not represent the bankers of America; it represents the financial institutions; it represents commerce, industry, and agriculture; it represents the 51,000,000 depositors who are dependent upon the banks for the safety of their savings; it represents the widows and orphans of America who are the beneficiaries of the trust funds in the banks.

I think this bill carries out a fundamental principle of the Constitution. This bill is fundamentally sound, not considered from the specific remedy it gives, but because it is in accord with the fundamental principles of our Government.

The power to tax is the power to destroy. If you allow the National Government to tax the governmental functions of the States, and if you allow the States to tax the functions of the National Government, you give into the hands of each the power to destroy the other. This will result in confusion worse confounded, and the founders of our Government did not expect any such result to accrue.

We would not have had a bit of trouble with this bill if it had not been that a certain distinguished gentleman from Texas had a fundamental misconception as to what would result.

He believes that if you reduce the number of shares of capital stock of the banks you reduce the yield in taxes to the State. That is not true. It has been said here today, and it has been said over and over again, and it is true, that the common-stock holders are the owners of the corporation, and whether the stock is of the par value of a million dollars, or a hundred dollars in par value, it represents the same thing. It represents the ownership of the corporation, and it represents the assets of the corporation.

In every State I am sure there is a certain formula in reference to ascertaining the taxable value of stock. It has been said that stock regardless of its value is taxed at par. What a ridiculous thing that would be. Here is a man that owns $100 of stock in a bank that is worth $300. Here is another man who owns $100 in stock in a bank that is worth $50. The tax rate is the same. Uniformity of taxation is a fundamental principle. If you tax the man who owns $50 in actual value the same as you tax a man who owns $300 in actual value you take away his property under the guise of taxation, without due process of law. You deny him equal protection of the law.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, like my good friend from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE], I am not proud. I learned about 3 years ago that if I was against a bill a committee brought out it was a rather difficult matter to get time from the majority side of the committee. So I usually go over to the Republican side, because I believe in trying to present my views. Today I was rewarded by their exceptional courtesy and received some time to oppose this measure, although denied such time by the Democratic side.

Mr. Chairman, I voted against this bill the last time it was up here for consideration and I intend to vote against it this time. I cannot begin to compete with the arguments of the bankers in reference to the technicalities of tax liability, most of their arguments being designed to confuse the issue. I do know that if we pass this legislation we take away a right from the States that they now enjoy. I think I am enough of a Jeffersonian Democrat to oppose taking away any more rights from the States. As a matter of fact, I would like to see the States get some of those rights back again that have been taken away from them in the last 10 years. That is the only principle upon which I am going to vote against the bill, although had I supported it before, the procedure under which it comes here today would arouse my suspicions.

Mr. Chairman, the thing that interested me today was the procedure by which this issue is again raised in the House. I was under the impression that we had disposed of this matter previously. I find, however, that even though I have once registered my vote on this same issue and same principle, it is brought up again, and were I not here to protect my record I would be placed in the unfair position of not standing by my record and principles on this bill. I would like to know about the procedure. Supposing the same procedure was followed by all committees that has been followed in the case of this bill. Suppose that the committee of which I am a member, the Indian Affairs Committee, brings up a bill for consideration in the House and it is defeated. Suppose further we have in the committee a similar Senate bill. Suppose we wait until all the Members who voted against our bill are absent from the House and then bring it up again. The implication is quite obvious, and the result is quite obvious, although the result would not be the true voice of the House.

Mr. Chairman, there is another question I would like to propound in connection with the procedure that brings this bill before the House again after having once been defeated. Does it infer that a changed vote on the part of the Members who defeated this issue about 10 days ago that they did not know what the bill was all about when they voted against it at that time? Now, if they change their vote are they confessing error and mistake or are they confessing discipline and persuasion?

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. The $30,000-a-year president of the Texas Bankers' Association has wired all the Texas Congressmen. I take it that the other banks and their lobby have been working since the defeat of this bill, and this time they expect to put it over.

Mr. O'MALLEY. May I say to the gentleman from Texas that I want to point out the implication which rises after the House has defeated an issue and then the same issue is brought in here again under the same conditions. We have not been able to get a rule upon the Frazier-Lemke bill to aid the farmers of this country, but two rules can be obtained in a few days on a defeated bill affecting the powerful bankers of the country.

Mr. Chairman, there are a lot of Members who voted against this bill absent today. They were undoubtedly under the impression that the issue had been disposed of at that time once and for all for this session. I wonder what mysterious power there is that brings in an issue which the representatives of the American people have already disposed of? What procedure makes it possible to have that bill again brought into this House for consideration? If our parliamentary procedure is such as to make this possible, I think we ought to change such unfair procedure. Once we have disposed of an issue, it was always my understanding of our parliamentary government that we have thereupon echoed the voice of the people we represent and that same issue could not be brought up again in a session to be talked to death or voted passed by methods designed to persuade Members to change their votes. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, the two largest counties in the twenty-fifth Illinois district had every one of their banks go broke during the past few years. If we are to get back on our feet we will have to have banking facilities. We have been struggling from that time to this hoping that we may have at least four new banks for the four largest cities in those two populous counties. We believe we are in sight of our part of the money if we can get the R. F. C. to take the preferred stock. We believe we are in sight of the organization of four new banks. Without this R. F. C. money we cannot get these banks. Without this money we cannot hope within any reasonable time to get back to a state of prosperity. If we do get that money we can form four new banks through the issuance of this preferred stock. If we keep up the tax rate that is necessarily in effect at the present time, under our unfortunate condition, and if we apply this local tax rate to the R. F. C. preferred stock, it would not only take all of the 3½ percent, but would absorb within a few years the whole amount of money which the R. F. C. would advance to us.

Therefore the R. F. C. would not be justified in giving us the money we absolutely require. The statement I am making for my own district applies, I have no doubt, to every other district in this country where the banking facilities still require part of this $100,000,000 we are talking about. Not only will this bill not deny the right to get taxes for local uses, but it will bring back into our community in due course hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxable property which prosperity will return to us, and will give our counties and our States and our municipalities the tax we must have to carry on. This R. F. C. aid has done this very thing everywhere it has been used to strengthen weakened banks and to establish new banks.

I therefore am unable to see why any man should stand up here and admit that the $400,000,000 that has already been advanced along this line shall not be taxed, and then turn around to these communities which have not yet been in position to take advantage of the offers of the R. F. C. to establish new banks where old ones have failed, which are the most unfortunate communities of all, and say to them, "Now, you shall not have the money; we are not going to let you have the money to revitalize yourselves, because you are too late. It has taken you too long to get on your feet again. It is just your bad luck. We could help you but we will not." The fact is that this $100,000,000 that is still available, as I understand it, will go to just that class of community which has been the most unfortunate and which requires and will continue to require the advance that the R. F. C. provides. If we get that we will come back. If we do not, it will take a long, long time to come back. And this is the whole thing in a nutshell.

The whole question we are answering here today is whether we are going to permit the $400,000,000 to go on and not be taxed—and it has not been and ought not to—but tax the next $100,000,000 advanced to the most unfortunate parts of the country. There is no movement, and no desire on the part of anyone, to go on and tax the $400,000,000 that is already out. It is simply the desire of the opponents of this bill to begin limiting or prohibiting the extension of the assistance to the R. F. C. that has worked such wonders toward recovery since its establishment.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, we are coming to the end of a long and rather wearisome discussion. At the risk of wearying you still more in the short time remaining, I shall try to recapitulate what this bill does and take up in detail the chief objections which have been raised to it.

Section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, which deals with the taxation of national banks, provides that taxation may be made in three different ways: By the taxation of the bank shares themselves, by the taxation of the dividends on those shares, and by the taxation of the banks on their earnings.

That is, roughly, a summary of the statute. All we are concerned with here are the 31 States which tax the shares of the national banks themselves.

Prior to the time when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation came into the field the question which you have heard batted back and forth, one side making one allegation and one side making another, as to who, whether the bank or the stockholder, pays the tax, was a moot question. Manifestly, when there was no stock in any bank but common stock it was immaterial whether the bank paid the tax and had less dividends, if any, for the common-stock holders, or whether the bank declared a theoretical dividend on the stock and then proceeded to deduct the amount of the tax before it paid the dividend.

The instant that preferred stock in national banks was sold, which was done under authority of the Emergency Banking Act of March 1933, a different picture naturally presented itself because of the fact that preferred stock was on a fixed rate of return.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, acting very rapidly under the exigencies of the circumstances and operating under the Emergency Banking Act of 1933, proceeded to acquire preferred stock in national banks, and proceeded in the course of the transaction to make a contract which, of course, the holder of any preferred stock makes to hold the stock on a fixed-return basis. This return was made, as you have been told time after time in this discussion, on such a low rate that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is compelled to pay taxes, by the time it deducts them, as it must, for the bank will pass them on to it, there is nothing left of the spread that the R. F. C. had allowed for operation purposes. To this extent, therefore, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will run behind on its operation in connection with these banks, to the extent of two or three or four or five million dollars. The amount is not material, because it is the principle we are discussing, and I, myself, have not analyzed the figures. It amounts, however, to several million dollars.

This is the gist of the bill. It simply establishes the fact that this stock, when held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and not when held by any private individual, when held by this emergency institution which went into certain localities to help out when it was impossible for the community itself to do the job, shall not be taxed and the R. F. C. shall not suffer as a result of its action.

Now, to take up in turn some of the fallacies which have been presented, some of them sincere and some of them thrown up as a smoke screen. In the first place, it is said this bill takes away from the States rights which they have now. The joker lies in what "now" means.

Of course, if the bill is not passed, the States have the right under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Maryland case to tax preferred stock in national banks. The bill removes that right. But that is only a right which has existed since the Reconstruction Finance Corporation came into being. There is no taking away any right which the State had before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation stepped into the picture.

It has been said that there will be a loss of revenue to the States. Of course, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation holdings are taxed the States will get a revenue which they did not have previously, but there is no taking away of revenue that any State had previously.

It has been said that the common stock of banks was taxed and that preferred stock has taken its place, that this has effected a substitution in some way and that if we exempt from taxation this preferred stock there will be removed a right the States previously had. That is an untrue statement. If you go into the logic of it and see how it operates, you will find the result is that the common stock, which is taxable, has been increased in value because the bank is in a sounder position.

Let us assume that a bank has a common stock of $100,000. Whether you divide it into 500 shares or 1,000 shares, the common stock is of a certain total value. It is not taking away anything of taxable value if you reduce in number the shares of common stock in order to make allowance for impairment of capital or if you double the shares in number for some purpose or other.

The common stock is still taxable, before and after, in the same way, at its actual value. When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation moves in and puts $100,000 more in preferred stock into that institution, it affects in no way the common stock that was taxable before, except insofar as that bank, being in a sounder position to do business, has common stock of a greater value than before; and if the stock is taxed on an ad valorem basis, the proper way to tax, there is greater revenue. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation by putting new capital into that bank really increases the value of the common stock. So, quite the contrary from the common stock being taken off the tax list, as a matter of fact the addition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation capital has increased the value of the common stock on the tax list.

Reference has been made to the analogy between the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Farm Credit Administration, where the Government has acquired real estate, perhaps under foreclosure and the situation before us now. It has been said that the situations are similar, and that we are removing property from taxation which was previously taxed. That, again, is a false statement. In the case of real estate which may be acquired by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation or Farm Credit Administration, manifestly it was always on the tax duplicate. There is no analogy between the acquisition of real estate by the Government which, if exempted from taxation, would naturally reduce the value of the tax list, and this particular situation. In every case where real estate is acquired by the Government, if it should be exempted from taxation, it removes property which was valued on the tax list of the community, while in the instant case all this money which was put in by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is newly created property—not property which was on the tax list prior to the time the Reconstruction Finance Corporation entered the field. It is new money placed there to help that community, and if exempted from taxation it can, therefore, in no sense be a deprivation of the State of property which it had previously taxed.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Not until I finish my statement, and then I shall be glad to yield first to the gentleman from Oregon.

Another criticism which has been leveled against this bill is that it is another tax-exempt security. This bill has nothing to do with tax-exempt securities, as we understand them. Let us analyze the philosophy of the opposition to tax-exempt securities. It is that wealthy people should not be in a position to acquire investments which, in the event they are Government securities, are exempted from State taxation, and specifically exempted perhaps from certain income taxes, or if they are State securities, are exempt from Federal taxation, and the holder goes tax free. Manifestly that is the philosophy behind the argument that we should have less and less tax-exempt securities, and perhaps eliminate what we already have now. There is no situation of that kind here. These are not securities in which an individual may invest. The instant an individual invests in any of the preferred stock that we are discussing, at that instant it becomes taxable. These are tax exempt only in the possession of an arm of the Government. Therefore, the argument about tax-exempt securities has nothing to do with what we are discussing here.

I have tried to point out the different fallacies which have been brought up and to answer each one of them in turn. Now in the short time left I would like to yield to anyone who wishes to ask me a specific question in reference to the bill. I yield, first, to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman said it was newly created wealth. It is newly created by selling tax-exempt bonds, is it not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. They are not bonds.

Mr. PIERCE. The R. F. C. does not have the money. It gets the money by selling tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct to that extent, for everything the Government does must be financed by the Government.

Mr. PIERCE. This extends the right to sell more tax-exempt securities.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman's argument would apply to all Government agencies.

Mr. PIERCE. And I am opposed to all tax-exempt bonds.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman spoke about the appreciation of values and the creation of new wealth in connection with these loans or investments, as he may choose to call them; but were not these loans or investments, whichever they may be, originally made for the purpose of bolstering what was considered to be crumbling existing values rather than the creation of new values?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Let me answer the gentleman in this way: Manifestly a bank which is in difficulties, and may perhaps be on the verge of closing its doors, or at least is not able to operate promptly, has common stock which has no taxable value. If, however, new capital is put in in the way of preferred stock, so that the bank has an adequate capital structure for its deposits and the carrying on of its business, the bank may again become prosperous and manifestly that old common stock, which had no value, is increased in value to a substantial extent.

Mr. KVALE. If it was a quid pro quo, if it was a matter of simply extending a loan on the basis of collateral that was considered adequate, I do not see the gentleman's point that new wealth is created.

Mr. HOLLISTER. We are not discussing the question of loans on collateral. We are talking about new capital being put in and preferred stock issued for that new capital. If the bank is successful, manifestly that increases the actual market value of the old common stock which was there before.

Mr. KVALE. Evidently I do not have the understanding of the subject that my friend has.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I will try to explain it to the gentleman later.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. I wish to ask a question, which, while not directly pertinent, seems to have an indirect bearing. When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation purchases the bonds of a railroad corporation, are those bonds not subject to taxation?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the Reconstruction Finance Corporation acquires bonds, notes, debentures, something outside of capital stock, which is taxed at the situs, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, having a situs in Washington and being a Government agency, such holdings would not be taxed by State laws, I would suppose.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It is stated in the bill that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation owns this stock. Is it not a fact, within the terms of the contract that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has with the bank, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is compelled to give that stock back to the bank when the loan is paid?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman knows that is almost always the situation with reference to all preferred stock of corporations. Almost every preferred stock contains provisions that the corporation may retire it if it so desires.

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is in the stock indenture?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Then, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation cannot elect, under the terms of the contract they have with the bank, the length of their ownership, they do not actually own the stock?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is the way with every corporate preferred stock. Almost every corporation has a contract with the stockholder that the corporation has the right to retire its preferred stock.

If a corporation has a right to retire its preferred stock at, say, 105, it may do so, but the ownership is none the less the ownership of the stockholder until the option is exercised.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman understands—

Mr. HOLLISTER. Will the gentleman please not say what I understand? I yield for the gentleman to ask a question, but I do not want the gentleman to say what I understand. I have heard him do that too often.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman support an amendment that will not cause the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to pay out any money on these taxes, but will prevent future contracts from being made which will take taxable property away from local communities?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If such an amendment would not be discriminative, I would; but I cannot conceive of such an amendment that would not make discriminations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 304 of the act entitled "An act to provide relief in the existing national emergency in banking and for other purposes", approved March 9, 1933, as amended, be further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law or any privilege or consent to tax expressly or impliedly granted thereby, the shares of preferred stock of national banking associations, and the shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of State banks and trust companies, heretofore or hereafter acquired by Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the dividends or interest derived therefrom by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, shall not, so long as Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall continue to own the same, be subject to any taxation by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or the District of Columbia, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, whether now, heretofore, or hereafter imposed, levied, or assessed, and whether for a past, present, or future taxing period."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, within the brief time I shall consume in discussing this matter upon the general principles involved in the bill, I will not undertake to recapitulate the arguments that have been made in favor of its passage. It seems to me that the problem with which we are confronted is a very simple one, in essence; that is, whether you are going to single out one particular field of property owned by a strictly governmental agency and subject it to State and municipal taxes, whereas every other piece of property of this nature is specifically exempted from taxation by the States and by municipalities.

Now, how is this measure presented here? It is apparent to me from a reading of section 10 of the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill that it was clearly, beyond all peradventure, the intent and purpose of the framers of that bill, which was in large measure a bipartisan product, and it was the intention and purpose of the Executive who approved that bill to exempt from State and local taxation the Government securities owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That construction, as I understand, has been given by the attorneys general in a great number of States. A great number of States under their statutes are prevented and prohibited from taxing Government securities of this kind. It was only because of a technical decision arising in a suit brought by the commissioner of banks in Maryland that the Supreme Court of the United States, and very properly, I imagine, under the strict construction of the statute, held that under the language of the bill as it then stood without this amendment, these securities held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were taxable by the States.

Why, gentlemen, as a matter of common equity, as a matter of common patriotism—and this is not a partisan question we are discussing here because the beneficent provisions and operations of this great corporation certainly transcend all party lines—why should we single out a particular type of security held by a great eleemosynary Federal organization and say, "The State shall tax this property but the State may not tax any other property held by the Federal Government for any local purpose"? As one gentleman said to me a few moments ago in private conversation referring to the old parable in Scripture of the good Samaritan, if you carry out this idea of taxing these securities of the Federal Government you are allowing the priest and the Levite to escape and are laying the penalty on this good Samaritan, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It has been such a beneficent, such a potent, such a helpful thing to many of the great communities of this country, great communities and small communities. What would have been the business structure of this country today, my friends, in thousands of localities where this agency has come to the relief of the banks and their stockholders if it had not been for its operations? Five million dollars to seven million dollars of taxes you are laying here upon this instrumentality of the Federal Government which you organized for the purpose of reconstructing the credit of the country. It seems to me that with the administration endorsing this bill and with the great man who is at the head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Jesse Jones, appealing to this Congress as a matter of business equity for you to pass it, when it comes here by the unanimous support of Republican and Democratic members of this Committee on Banking and Currency, when its merits have been argued and presented to you, it seems to me that despite any preconceived notion you may have had with reference to the merits of the bill and after this the second time it has been presented for your consideration, that under all these circumstances you ought to grant the request of the Administrator of this great nonpartisan, bipartisan, patriotic institution which is operating for the benefit of all of the people of the United States. I trust this bill may be passed today. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment and ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee, both Members having risen on pro-forma amendments.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. The point of order is that two Members rose, the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself. The gentleman from Wisconsin asked recognition to strike out the last two words. I ask for recognition in opposition to the pro-forma amendment which is pending. I think I am entitled to recognition.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the floor at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It is a matter for the gentleman from Wisconsin to decide. The Chair understood that both the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Texas rose on pro-forma amendments, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin, a member of the committee; but he having yielded the floor, the gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that 240 minutes were allowed for debate on this bill, and the opponents used only 37 minutes of the time, and a great deal of that time was taken up in answering questions propounded by the committee, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman said "10 additional minutes." Does this mean 15 minutes altogether?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the Chair interprets the request.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to proceed for 10 additional minutes?

There was no objection.

AGREEMENT ABOUT BILL

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am not taking issue with my distinguished colleague, the majority leader at this time; I am not opposing anything he said. I had an agreement about this bill. As I said yesterday I did not trade with the committee, but I had an agreement about this bill.

When this matter was under consideration before in the form of a House bill the opposition presented certain arguments why the bill should be defeated. We are not going back on those arguments, as has been charged; nor are we inconsistent, as has been charged. We spent nights and days before the Banking and Currency Committee and with the officials of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation trying to iron out the differences to do just exactly what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said should be done.

Finally I said: "If you will convince me that you cannot raise the interest rate from 3½ percent back to 6 so as to take care of local taxes, although I am not in favor of the principle—I am opposed to it; I believed that the R. F. C. made these loans in good faith—I am willing to yield on that. I am willing to yield on it provided you will yield on this, that you will not permit it to be done in the future."

This was what I considered the agreement, and the acting chairman of this committee told me that he would let me know at 12 o'clock yesterday if he would carry it out and not oppose the amendment I proposed, to strike out the words "or hereafter." At 12 o'clock yesterday on this floor he said he had consulted with members of the committee on the majority side and they would not oppose the amendment.

TRAPPED—NEVER AGAIN

Now I am placed in a position of disadvantage. Members who do not want the bill to pass in any form will vote against my amendment, and since the committee has gone back on me—that is, I thought the majority members would support it—my amendment will not get many votes. It is exceedingly hard for me to carry out my promise, but if the heavens fall I will do what I said and make a sincere effort to do it. My word is out to leaders of the administration and officials of the R. F. C. Never again will I permit myself to get in this position. If carried out it would have been all right, but it is certainly embarrassing when I am the only one carrying out the agreement. This is the unfair method I have ever known to be used to place an opponent at a disadvantage. I will suffer for relying on what I considered a promise, but I hope to never get into such a predicament again. What hurts me is I was yielding to be helpful, at the same time gaining a major objective, but the result was I was trapped. This bill was defeated by a vote of 165 to 173 on February 25, 1936, and it would have been defeated again if I had not spent several days and nights cooperating in an effort to be helpful.

AGREEMENT NOT CARRIED OUT

I acted on what I thought was the agreement. I believed they would carry it out. The rule came up for consideration yesterday and the Acting Chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. SABATH, asked me about time. I told him that we had an agreement about the bill, and so far as I was concerned we were going to condone, not agree to but condone, past transactions. I told him we were going to stop the precedent for the future and did not want any time; that the majority members of the committee would not oppose my amendment. We told him to just go ahead and adopt the rule; that I would vote for it. If I had known then what I know now we would have certainly opposed the rule. I did not say a word about the rule, believing the agreement would be carried out. The acting chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency got up on this floor yesterday and said substantially what I am saying now about the agreement.

Mr. REILLY. Speaking for himself.

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know whom he was speaking for, but I understood he was speaking for the majority members of the committee; he told me he had consulted them. When this bill was up before, you said you were voting for it in order that you would not break faith with the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who had made these contracts in good faith. If you are willing to vote for it to keep from breaking faith with Mr. Jones, why do you not vote for my amendment in order to carry out the chair-man's agreement? I am going to offer an amendment which will mean, if the amendment is adopted, that the R. F. C. will not be out any money for taxes on past transactions. As much as I dislike to do it, I have yielded on that. I have yielded on principle. I am not going back on my word, and I will never go back on any trade I make. [Applause.]

TAXES PAYABLE ON FUTURE TRANSACTIONS

The R. F. C. will not be out any money, if my amendments are adopted in accordance with what I thought the agreement was. It means, however, that in the future a bank that wants money from the R. F. C. will pay 3½ percent, the uniform rate in existence all over this country. It means, in addition, that the R. F. C. will tell them: "You will have to pay, yourselves, the local taxes as heretofore." It is right that they pay these taxes. The directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation did not oppose that view and, as a matter of fact, I believe they are in favor of it.

They appeared before this committee and asked for an amendment that would have permitted them to do just that, but the committee turned down their proposal last Saturday. The acting chairman of the committee called Mr. Jesse Jones who had left here for a much-needed rest in Miami, Fla., and asked him about the amendment which I expected to offer today. Mr. Jones, according to the acting chairman, stated it was perfectly all right with him. He wants it and needs it.

Now, then, you praise Mr. Jones, and he is entitled to be praised. You say we should follow him. You say we should follow the administration. I say the administration wants this bill, but the administration is not opposed to my amendment. Therefore, adopt the amendment and then adopt the bill as amended.

The gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Alabama contend that the R. F. C. should not be taxed because the Federal land-bank securities and other similar securities are not taxed. I agree generally with that contention, except where taxable property is taken away from the local communities. We will not require them to pay these back taxes, but in the future we are not going to allow them to make contracts that will permit local property for private gain to escape taxation. That is what we do not like.

FIRST MISTAKE MADE BY COMMITTEE

Let me tell you the difference. Here is a case where the Banking and Currency Committee brought in a bill. I was generous with them yesterday. I thought they were going to carry out their agreement with me. I said at that time that the House had made a mistake. I want to change that. The first mistake was made by this very committee. They brought in a bill that denied the R. F. C. the right to purchase debentures and notes from national banks. If they had made the law uniform, as it should have been made, and any person who is informed on the subject now admits it should have been made that way, this question would not have risen. But they fixed it so the R. F. C. had to buy preferred stock from the national banks and notes and debentures from State banks. This created an inequality, and I will show you just what that inequality is.

A State bank with a million-dollar capital sells a $500,000 debenture to the R. F. C. The R. F. C. does not pay a tax on that, and it should not pay a tax. It would be wrong to make them pay a tax on it. But the State bank continues to pay a tax locally, as heretofore, because it pays on its capital stock as the basis in 31 States of the country. The national bank with a million dollar capital stock should be permitted to sell debentures like the State banks. Then they would be on the same plane. But the committee, by this bill, requires them to sell the preferred stock, which is a part of the capital structure, and when the preferred stock is sold they plead tax exemption. If you vote for this bill you will vote to condone and encourage that principle, which is the one I am against. I am not in favor of taxing debentures and notes. No. Taxable property is not taken from the local tax rolls when the R. F. C. purchases debentures, but taxable property is taken from the local tax rolls when preferred stock is purchased.

WHERE WILL EXEMPTIONS STOP?

Mr. Chairman, if the Members carry this to its logical conclusion, if we pass this bill, the next bill to be brought in will be one exempting the insurance companies' capital structure to the extent that they have sold securities to the R. F. C. If you are consistent you will have to vote for that bill. The next bill will be one for the farmer who has a $5,000 loan against half of his farm. It is a $10,000 farm. He will come in and say: "The Government holds a security against half of my property. I am not arguing that you should tax the Government, but you should keep the local tax assessor off me. You do it for the bankers, why do you not do it for the farmers?"

The next contention that will come in will be from the home owners. They will come in and say: "The Government holds a lien equal to half the value of my home. I want you to keep the tax collector off me. He is trying to make me pay according to full face value. When the R. F. C. purchased half the taxable property of a national bank you voted for a bill to give such banks a 50-percent tax reduction in all States, counties, cities, and so forth, because the R. F. C. is a governmental institution. Since the lien on my home, equal to 50 percent of its value, is held by a governmental institution, you should pass a law giving me a 50-percent tax reduction in all States, counties, cities, and so forth."

What would be your answer?

Well, if you are consistent, if you vote for this bill to allow the national banks a 50-percent reduction, when you have taken half of their capital structure, you will vote to exempt half of the homes and farms of the country in a situation such as I have described.

I will admit, Mr. Chairman, that there will still be a discrimination here if this amendment passes, but the discrimination will not be near so much and we will be establishing the policy for the future that we are not going to exempt property from taxation in the local communities because some Federal agency happens to hold a lien on it, or acquires all or part of it.

WILL RAILROADS BE EXEMPT?

Where is this going? When the R. F. C. takes over a railroad, say two or half a dozen of them, are you going to come in and ask for tax exemption on them? If you are consistent and vote for this bill you will do it.

WILL BANKS AND INSURANCE COMPANIES BE EXEMPT?

What are you going to do when the R. F. C. takes over some banks and insurance companies? Are you going to bring a bill in here to make them tax exempt? If you vote for this bill you will have to, because you would not be consistent unless you did.

UNFAIR DIVISION OF TIME

Now, there is very little difference here, Mr. Chairman, between the ones opposing and proposing this legislation, since I am carrying out my part of the agreement. We have not had ample time to discuss it. I had 10 minutes yielded to me the other day by the chairman of the committee and then he asked me almost enough questions to take up the 10 minutes. I could not refuse to yield to him, because I was expecting him to yield me some more time. Then, he yielded me 10 minutes and that was taken up and then 5 minutes and then 2 minutes. We have only had 37 minutes out of the 240 minutes of general debate time. That is not a fair division.

COMMITTEE DID NOT BRING OUT ALL THE FACTS

I went before the Banking and Currency Committee for 3 days. They put me on first. That was all right. I did not mind that—I was glad to testify first, although it is customary to use the proponents first. I stayed there 3 days trying to get these differences ironed out. At one time the committee was not bringing out all the information from Mr. Jones. The members of the committee are all opposed to me on this bill and I wrote the chairman of the committee a letter, carried it to him myself, asking him to let me interrogate Mr. Jones, so I could bring out the very points I am bringing out here today. This request was refused. I was a Member of the House and I was the only Member of the House who was sitting there that had the opposite side, but I was refused the right to ask any witness before that committee any question.

PROPERTY USED FOR PRIVATE PROFIT SHOULD NOT BE EXEMPT FROM TAXATION

When this bill was up here before very little time was granted to the opponents. Notwithstanding that the Members of the House voted with us and the bill was killed. It is back here now a second time. I do hope, Mr. Chairman, you will concede this point and that you will vote for this amendment that will establish the policy for this Government—and that is what the amendment will do—that in the future when Government boards and bureaus and commissions purchase a part of the capital structure of a private corporation that is organized and operating for private profit, the Government will not exempt such property from local taxation.

This is the policy I want you to establish and this is the policy I believe the Members of this House would like to have established.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the entire committee is favorable to this bill, Republicans and Democrats alike. I yielded my time this afternoon so that the opposition might have plenty of time, but there are one or two things about this measure to which I wish to call attention.

On page 2, "dividends or interest derived therefrom by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not, so long as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation owns them, be subject to taxation." Even if you pass this bill, when are you going to get the Reconstruction Finance Corporation out of this business? By the passage of this bill, if it cannot sell them, it will have to hold them for 20 years, reducing them 5 percent a year. Some of us would like to go further and get it out of business and get this stock back into the hands of private people. What harm can it do if these shares are exempt? All other Government securities are exempt. But the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in order to save this $5,000,000, was ready to accept an amendment which the gentleman from Texas intended to offer. He said, in effect: "You will not catch me issuing any more preferred stock. We will issue capital notes in the national banks. We will take their capital notes, and so long as the situs of the capital notes is in Washington we will not have to pay any tax." But the Texas people apparently say, "Yes; but when those capital notes are found in the State of Texas then we can get them at our regular rate." Is it a good idea to buy capital notes?

The Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation knows he cannot dispose of the preferred stock. It is a matter of record; and would have to pay taxes. But he might later sell capital notes, because the public at large might not know you have them in your possession. It might bootleg them in the States the same as other securities are bootlegged. So, the Chairman is willing to take a great chance, because he might get out of business sometime. I, for one, want to get him out anyway. If you take a chance and buy capital notes and can fool the assessor, all well and good.

These gentlemen are making a hard fight for the treasury of the State of Texas. In this I find myself not too sympathetic. They got $220,000,000 from the Government for their treasury last year and contributed only $77,000,000. In my State we contributed $114,000,000 and received only $77,000,000. My sympathy for your treasury, sir, is somewhat dampened although this is a wonderful fight you are making for a little more money for Texas. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: On page 2, in line 4, after the word "acquired", strike out the words "or hereafter."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] listens to me, because if all of his statement was as incorrect as one part of it that I know was incorrect, his statement should not have much effect on this Committee. The gentleman stated that when a citizen purchased capital notes and debentures the State would cause it to be taxed. Of course, if a bank purchased it, it will not be taxed, and they do not tax it in the hands of individuals in Texas. Therefore the gentleman is entirely mistaken about what he said.

SURPRISE PLEADED BY COMMITTEE

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] said they were surprised when the bill came in the first time, on February 25; that they did not know there was any opposition to it. Why would the gentleman lead you to believe that? I do not know; but it is a well-known fact, and I certify to it now, that I went before the Committee on Rules and I opposed a rule on the bill before. I opposed the granting of a rule on February 24, 1936. I gave the reasons then that I have consistently given since that time. The next day the bill was brought in, and certainly they could not plead surprise.

SACRIFICE OF VIEWS

Now, because I agree to yield on a principle if they will yield on a principle I am accused of being inconsistent. I recognize the fact that there is no major piece of legislation that becomes a law unless it represents a compromise of view or a sacrifice of opinion on the part of practically every Member of the House and Senate. I was willing to sacrifice my views if they would sacrifice some views. I sacrificed certain views. They agreed to sacrifice certain views. I carried out my agreement and they are not carrying out their agreement.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I am talking about the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. CROSS of Texas. The gentleman is not quoting us?

Mr. PATMAN. I am quoting him. He said it substantially himself. I am quoting what he said. The gentleman from Texas was here and heard him. At 12 o'clock yesterday he was to let me know. I came here at 12 o'clock yesterday, and he said he had consulted with the majority members of this committee and it was perfectly all right—to go ahead. I acted on that agreement.

Now, who is in favor of this amendment which I have offered? The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is in favor of it. They say it is all right. Why should we oppose it? What will it do? Nothing on earth except establish a policy for the Government in the future against the taking of taxable wealth from local communities at a time when local communities need all the taxable wealth they can get in order to raise their share of the money under the Social Security Act that we passed.

BANKERS' BONUS BILL

Do you want to adopt a policy here which is for the bankers? Now, from here on out it is a bankers' bonus bill. You can say anything you want to, but from here on out it is a bankers' bonus. I am talking about the future. We can dismiss the past for the present. Mr. Jones said he is ready to disburse $100,000,000. He says that if this amendment passes he will be allowed to purchase the stock and the stock will pay local taxes as heretofore. They, the banks, will get their money at 3½ percent interest and will continue to pay local taxes as heretofore. So if you vote against this amendment, you are voting to save those banks who get this $100,000,000 at least $2,500,000 that they would have to pay in local taxes. This is a clear bonus for these banks; it is a subsidy, or whatever you want to call it. A vote against this amendment is a vote to give those banks who get this $100,000,000 at least $2,500,000. They are not expecting it, they are not entitled to it, and the R. F. C. ought not to be allowed to permit them to escape local taxes. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be adopted. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. Had not all time on the amendment expired?

The CHAIRMAN. All time on the amendment has expired, but the gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word, which is another amendment.

The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, it is very interesting to watch the somewhat devious gyrations of the opponents of this bill. They have been inconsistent from the very beginning. They discuss the bill from the point of view of discrimination at one time and ask that the bill be defeated on that ground. They ask that it be defeated another time on the ground that it exempts securities from taxation. The same gentleman gives absolutely contradictory reasons for having the bill defeated. Now they are proposing exemptions from taxation to apply to stock already held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, saying that is satisfactory, but with respect to any bank which hereafter wishes assistance from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they say the same thing shall not apply. It is really a little bit difficult to answer so many absolutely inconsistent objections.

May I point out what the gentleman from Texas said when he appeared before the committee at the time he was discussing the bill in general? He said:

It is a bad precedent. It creates discrimination.

A little later he stated:

It will create a dozen discriminations. They are treated differently by the taxing authorities. Instead of this bill removing discriminations it creates discriminations.

I wonder if the Members of the House realize that if the amendment sponsored by the gentleman is passed there will be 31 different discriminations in this law? If the gentleman's amendment is adopted all stock now held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will carry 3½ percent dividends. After the present time manifestly it will be necessary for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to add on to the dividend rate enough to satisfy the tax of the particular State. If the Members who have at hand the hearings will turn to page 48, they will see the different States affected, 31 of them. Some of them are assessed on a 100-percent ad valorem basis; some 90 percent, and so on down, and practically every one of them at a different rate of tax. In other words, in order to fit this thing in exactly so that the dividend rate will be enough to satisfy the tax, there will be 31 different kinds of preferred stock contracts which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will have to make.

Mr. Chairman, it will also mean that whereas a bank in one city may be fixed up already by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and will pay only 3½ percent, a bank in another city may have to pay 5 or 6 percent, whatever it may be, to satisfy the tax in order to get the relief that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is now giving to hundreds of banks and perhaps even thousands of banks throughout the country.

Here is a gentleman who tries to defeat this bill on the ground of discrimination coming in and asking us to adopt an amendment that will put 31 different discriminations into the act.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is my amendment which the gentleman who has just spoken is endeavoring to destroy. He has made a 5-minute speech on behalf of an amendment which will destroy it, and I ask for recognition in order to answer the gentleman's argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has been recognized and has presented an argument in favor of his amendment. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, a member of the committee, rises in opposition to the pro-forma amendment, and is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect to consume the entire 5 minutes, but I do want to point out that while the great financier and philosopher from Texas is one of the most lovable "cusses" I have ever seen, yet his ideas are almost as vagarious as the floodwaters we are reading about at the present time. These days they run swift, deep, and turbulent; some days they peter out to a mere trickle. His principles and convictions are a good deal like that. He appeared before the committee on March 11, when the meeting was called at his request, and in a colloquy with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] the gentleman from Maryland said: "You are coming here to destroy legislation." The gentleman from Texas stated: "That is a mere incidental." He stated further: "The principle involved is greater than that, my dear sir."

He referred to the principle involved. He is reasoning from a principle. How strange it is that he is willing to condone, as he says, a principle. He says in effect this: "The R. F. C. has now subscribed to $229,000,000 of preferred stock that is taxable." He says:

I am willing to condone that. I am willing to forgive the derelictions and the delinquencies of the committee, even though they do not agree with me, if they will share my view that from here on out on the other $100,000,000 that may be committed by the R. F. C., we will take away the exemption and impose the tax.

He is willing today to sacrifice two-thirds of his principle. When he appeared before the Banking Committee on March 11 he contended for the entire principle. It shows that, after all, his convictions do not run very deep, and today he is willing to chuck two-thirds of his principle out of the window.

This shows to what extent we ought to follow his persuasive eloquence in respect of this matter.

The amendment which he offers contains the two words "or hereafter." He is willing to say, "I will forget all about the $229,000,000 if you will impose the tax on the other $100,000,000 that the R. F. C. in the future may commit." What kind of legislation would this be? How can we justify it from the standpoint of consistency to say to the R. F. C., having subscribed $229,000,000, we will exempt all preferred stock so far as that is concerned, but in the future the tax must be paid and there shall be no exemption. Frankly, we must vote against that kind of thing if we are going to preserve any kind of consistency in the matter of banking legislation, and I admonish the House to vote the amendment down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were—ayes 27, noes 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: Page 2, line 12, after the period, insert: "Provided, however, That in the future national banks that sell preferred stock to the R. F. C. shall be placed in the same position with reference to the payment of all taxes as a State bank that sells debentures instead of preferred stock to the R. F. C."

TREAT STATE AND NATIONAL BANKS ALIKE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will affect future contracts to this extent, that the R. F. C. in making a contract with a national bank will leave that national bank in exactly the same position with reference to local taxation that the State bank across the street is in, and this is all it does.

I do not see how anyone can oppose this amendment. It is simply telling the R. F. C. not to make any contract that will place a State bank at a disadvantage with its competitor across the street. I do not think any member of the committee should oppose this amendment, because it is absolutely fair and right.

A few moments ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] made the statement that my other amendment would create 31 discriminations. If that method of arriving at the number of discriminations, due to the fact there are 31 States using this method of taxation, is correct, the present law that the gentleman wants us to vote for creates 93 different discriminations, because it discriminates against the State bank and the national bank that has half of its stock sold to the R. F. C. and gets a 50-percent reduction. This is a discrimination against a State bank that has the same capital and is getting the same amount of money from the R. F. C. This will account for 62 discriminations.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that the gentleman's amendment means that the R. F. C. will sell to national banks debentures instead of preferred stock?

Mr. PATMAN. It means that any contract that is made with a national bank will leave the national bank with reference to local taxation in the same position that a State bank would be in under similar and like circumstances, getting the same amount of money from the R. F. C.

Mr. SNELL. I understood from the reading of the amendment it provided for the selling of debentures.

Mr. PATMAN. In effect that would be it.

Mr. SNELL. A debenture would be ahead of stock as a security.

Mr. PATMAN. We are talking about taxation, I will say to the gentleman from New York, and we are considering it just from the taxation standpoint, and it would not be taxable.

Mr. SNELL. A debenture is nothing more or less than a note of the bank.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. So the note would have preference over stock.

Mr. PATMAN. Just like in a State bank, exactly.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, the theory of this whole proposition has been to put out more capital in order to make the capital structure stronger.

Mr. PATMAN. They will get the new capital.

Mr. SNELL. A debenture is not capital.

Mr. PATMAN. Please do not take up all my time.

The point is this. There is discrimination against the State bank, there is discrimination against the national bank that has not borrowed from the R. F. C.; and if this bill passes, the individual citizen, who holds preferred stock in that same institution, will get enough money from the local bank to pay local taxes, but the R. F. C. will not be required to pay local taxes and the banks will not be required to pay local taxes. Therefore it is a discrimination against the individual holders of preferred stock in 31 States who have part of the same stock that the R. F. C. holds. So, if my amendment created 31 discriminations, there is in existing law today more than 93 discriminations.

I hope this amendment, which is just to put them all on the same plane, will certainly be adopted.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, without intending to be disrespectful in the least, I want to say that this is not a clarifying amendment nor a perfecting amendment, but purely another confusing amendment designed, in my opinion, to confound the true issue and further delay the passage of this meritorious measure. As a matter of fact, it is identical in effect to the amendment which we have just voted down by a vote of 129 to 27. Let us coolly and dispassionately consider the situation as it now exists with respect to the taxation of the securities held by the R. F. C. As has been pointed out quite clearly by several members of the committee today, the preferred stock, notes, and debentures of State banks issued to the R. F. C. are not taxable. Under the law, national banks are permitted to issue preferred stock only. Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Baltimore bank case, the preferred stock was declared to be taxable because of section 5219 of the Revised Statutes which was enacted in 1864. Therefore, if you pass this bill you eliminate the only discrimination that can possibly exist with respect to the taxation of any security issued by State or national banks to the R. F. C. You place them all on an equality. This is surely but right and just and carries out the purpose and intent of the Congress as expressed in section X of the Reconstruction Finance Act. Under the present order of things, the preferred stock of national banks is the only security that could be taxed, and with its elimination the securities of all banks issued to the R. F. C., as I have just stated, are placed upon the same basis.

My friend from Texas has tried in many ingenious ways to show that he has been discriminated against with respect to time. The record will show that the committee has been absolutely fair to him, both in its hearings and in its handling of the bill on the floor. As a matter of fact, he has done more talking in both places than any member of the committee. His reference to the committee keeping its agreement is beside the point, for the statement of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the acting chairman, clearly shows that he was speaking alone for himself in his remarks yesterday. My friend from Texas has made a desperate struggle to get some concession on this bill which would take him "off the limb." I would, of course, like to see him get off, but I would not think of sacrificing a belief, much less a principle, to arrange it. What arrangements or negotiations he may have had with the chairman or with Mr. Jones has nothing to do with the position of the committee. At the same time, I am sure that the efforts which he has made privately to bring about a conciliation of differences have been made in good faith; but no member of the committee here today has ever agreed privately to any of his proposals. Any further discussion of his amendment is, in my opinion, time thrown away, and I ask you to vote it down. We can then make progress toward putting the bill on its final passage. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after the period, insert the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any national banking association may, with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, pursuant to action taken by its board of directors, issue to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation its capital notes or debentures in such amounts and with such maturities as the Comptroller of the Currency may approve. The holders of such capital notes or debentures shall be entitled to receive such interest, at a rate not exceeding 6 percent per annum of the principal amount thereof, and shall have such conversion rights, priorities, control of management, and other rights, and such capital notes or debentures shall be subject to retirement or redemption in such manner and upon such conditions as may be provided therein with the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency."

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment. The bill before the House is a bill relating to the taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is an amendment to the Emergency Banking Act of 1933, as clearly appears from the bill, being an amendment to section 304. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is not an amendment to the Emergency Banking Act of 1933. It has nothing to do with the taxation of preferred stock, capital notes, or debentures owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but is an amendment to the general banking laws of the United States and permits national banks, as they never have been permitted in the past, to issue notes and debentures in addition to capital stock. It is not an amendment to the same act, and it is not germane to the subject matter of the bill before us.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. The amendment I offer is an amendment proposed to this bill and deals with the subject matter that the bill deals with. The bill deals with the issuance by banks and the purchasing by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of preferred stock of national banks. It also deals with the issuance by State banks and the purchases by the R. F. C. of notes and debentures of State banks. My amendment deals with that subject matter and provides that hereafter in dealing with the problem we are now dealing with, the R. F. C. will be permitted, if it desires, to accept from national banks the same kind of securities, notes, and debentures that the R. F. C. is now privileged to accept from State banks and trust companies. I think it is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas is an amendment to section 1 of the bill. This section deals with the matter of exemptions from taxation. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas deals with the issuance of debentures and notes. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: Page 2, line 12, after the period, insert the following: "Provided, however, That in all future purchases of preferred stock from a national bank by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may require the bank to pay local taxes in the same way and manner that it would be required to pay, were the stock not purchased by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition on that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order; and, so far as the matter of recognition is concerned, debate upon the section is exhausted.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section in that it provides a manner under which the R. F. C. may purchase the holdings of banks and has no relationship whatsoever to the question which is before the House, namely, the taxation of shares of stock of banks owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order. The amendment gives the R. F. C. discretion. It uses the word "may." The R. F. C. may require that. That is, in a case where the bank is already paying large salaries to officers and directors, it is in a position and able to pay local taxes. The R. F. C. will have the discretion, if the bank is able to pay local taxes, to require the bank to pay them. The bank is getting this money for 3½ percent. The amendment merely grants the discretion to the R. F. C. There is nothing else to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The section under consideration deals with the matter of tax exemptions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas undertakes to give the Reconstruction Finance Corporation discretion to require that local banks may be taxed by local authorities. The Chair is constrained to believe it is not germane, and sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Effective upon the date of enactment of this act, interest charges on all loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to closed banks and trust companies, now in force, or made subsequent to the date of enactment of this act, shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum: Provided, however, That no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize a reduction in the rate of interest on such loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation retroactive from the date of enactment of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 2. That, effective upon and from the date of enactment of this act, interest on all outstanding loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to receivers and liquidating agents of closed banks and trust companies, and all such loans made subsequent to the date of enactment of this act, shall be at the rate of 3½ percent per annum on condition that the rate of interest charged debtors of such banks or trust companies shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum; otherwise such interest rate shall be as fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a committee substitute for section 2, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Michigan for the committee: Strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof:

"Sec. 2. Effective upon the date of enactment of this act interest charges on all loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to closed banks and trust companies, now in force or made subsequent to the date of enactment of this act, shall not exceed 3½ percent per annum, on condition that the rate of interest charged debtors of such banks or trust companies shall not exceed 4½ percent per annum. Otherwise such interest rates shall be as fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Provided, however, That no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize a reduction in the rate of interest on such loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation retroactive from the date of enactment of this act."

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of section 2 is to provide that hereafter, from the effective date of this act, the interest rates charged by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to insolvent banks shall not exceed 3½ percent interest per annum, upon condition that the receiver of such insolvent National or State bank shall reduce the interest that he charges the debtors of that bank, down to 4½ percent.

The language of the committee amendment has the same meaning as the language in section 2 of the bill before you, but this change will expedite the enactment of this bill into law because of the parliamentary situation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. What will be the cost to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by adopting this amendment?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation at the present time is borrowing its money at about 2¾ percent. Under this bill they would loan to closed banks at not to exceed 3½ percent.

Mr. SNELL. I did not make myself clear, apparently. They are loaning for more than that at the present time, are they not?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. How much will their income be reduced as a result of this?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The only answer I can give the gentleman is that the rate charged closed banks is 4 percent at the present time, and this will reduce it one-half of 1 percent. I cannot tell the gentleman what the amount is in dollars and cents.

Mr. SNELL. But the purpose of this original bill was to make money for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I think you are going to lose almost as much from this reduction of interest.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. The gentleman understands this applies only to closed banks.

Mr. SNELL. But how many hundred millions have they loaned to closed banks?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I cannot tell the gentleman. I can assure him this reduction will not materially affect the R. F. C. and will greatly aid distressed debtors and depositors.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. What will happen to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation if the market goes so that there is a higher rate of interest for Government securities?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. I think we would have to change the statute, but we do not expect that condition to arise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were—ayes 136, noes 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 3. If any provision, word, or phrase of this act, or the application thereof to any condition or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of this act to other conditions or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker, having resumed the chair, Mr. WHITTINGTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and reaffirming their immunity, pursuant to House Resolution No. 451, he reported the same back to the House with an amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOILEAU) there were ayes 172 and noes 87.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 218, nays 144, not voting 68, as follows:

On motion of Mr. REILLY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Senate is waiting in session to take up consideration of the bill we have just passed. Time is of the essence in this matter. Ordinarily it would be necessary to have the House stay in session to receive the bill or a message from the Senate.

I offer the following resolution, Mr. Speaker, and ask for its immediate consideration.

House Resolution 455

Resolved, That notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to receive a message from the Senate and the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign the enrolled bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and reaffirming their immunity, pursuant to House Resolution 451.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. REILLY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a good many Members have asked me what the program will be for tomorrow. The arrangement is that we will call up for consideration the rule on the so-called long- and short-haul bill, the Pettengill bill, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Some of the Members of the flood districts are very anxious to go back home over the week end. I hope no vote will be taken on the bill while we are away.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I may state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I understand some 5 hours are provided for general debate, and I feel it very improbable that we shall reach a vote before next week.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION WITH REGARD TO ROOSEVELT DEMOCRATIC ADMINISTRATION RECORD

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I made over the radio at Detroit a short while ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address given by me over radio station WMBC, Detroit, Mich., recently:

We in America have heard much talk in the past half dozen years about the future of democracy as a form of government. The economic depression, which began in 1929, has brought such misery and distress that some are asking whether or not our whole social and political organization, which places the control of policy and of the administration of government in the hands of the people, is not too slow and too cumbersome to meet the complicated situations of modern economic life. We have seen several nations in Europe in the past 10 years turn away from the democratic ideal, and there are groups in our own Nation who counsel us to discard democratic principles and ask us to follow the road to Fascist dictatorship or to communistic dictatorship.

I do not believe that American democracy is in danger. The people of our Nation are too firmly convinced of the values of popular participation in government to be misled into dictatorship of any form. It is true, however, that government is today a complicated business. Our Government is no longer merely an agent to provide law and order; government today is more than the policeman on the corner. Today our Government touches on our lives in hundreds of ways. We are asking today that our Government provide hundreds of services—that it aid us in the control of our economic system. So much does government do today that the business of government has become the largest business in the Nation.

Now the point I wish to make is this: That as government and the problems of government become more and more complicated in a democracy it becomes increasingly necessary that the people keep themselves informed on the issues of the day. This holds for State and local government as well as for national issues. The people of the United States must, if our democracy is to succeed, follow the work of their representatives in national and local legislatures. This Government rests on the principle that the people shall make the decisions as to choice of leadership and policies, and unless the people are informed—unless they know what the leaders stand for—unless they understand the meaning of policies and programs our Government will not function as it should.

It is because I feel that the people cannot exercise their right of voting intelligently unless they know what has been done by the party in power and what objections and counter proposals have been made by the opposing party that I will discuss one of the vital problems of the day.

We, the Democratic Party, have nothing to hide or conceal, and all that we ask is that the people of America consider calmly and dispassionately our record. I want, then, to lay some of that record before you.

We have passed the Social Security Act in the interest of humanity; we have passed agricultural legislation in the interest of the farmer; we have also passed the Wagner labor bill, the Railroad Retirement Act, the Guffey coal bill, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and many other laws in behalf of labor and agriculture.

The issue I wish to discuss with you is one which has presented itself to the American people within the past couple of years. This is the issue raised as to the constitutionality of certain items on the program of President Roosevelt and the Democratic Party. I do this because of criticism by certain reactionary elements, prominent among them being such organizations as the American Liberty League. The leaders of America 148 years ago, who had been in convention during the whole summer, finished their work and presented to the American people our Constitution. They were faced with political and economic problems comparable in gravity with those facing the leaders of our Nation today, and they had the vision to see what was desirable and to act.

The biggest problem which faced these men was the question of what powers should be given to the Federal Government and which powers should be reserved to the States. In the light of their experience they made their decision. Today in the United States we are again facing that question of how extensive the powers of the United States Government should be.

Let me explain the point by reference to the recent Supreme Court decisions—the decisions which declared unconstitutional the National Industrial Recovery Act, the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and others. With the technicalities of these decisions we did not bother ourselves. Generally the decisions meant that the National Government was exceeding its power when it attempted to control the problems of labor, agriculture, and industry. The Court arrived at these decisions on the basis of the argument that no power to exercise such control had been granted to the National Government by the men who made the Constitution 148 years ago. It is on this point that the question becomes a political issue. The Republican Party contends, I believe, that the division of powers as made 148 years ago should not be touched. They believe that the powers of the National Congress should not be increased—they believe that these powers are ample to meet the problems of today even though there is no national power to regulate industry and to control the conditions of labor. They tell us that the powers that were granted to the National Government 148 years ago should be interpreted strictly, even though this means that our Federal Government is prevented from acting in the field of national economic problems.

The Democratic Party, on the other hand, believes that the list of powers granted 148 years ago, if these powers are to be interpreted strictly, are not ample to permit the necessary control of industry and to permit the solution of the problems of agriculture and of labor.

Allow me to explain the issue a bit further. One hundred and forty-eight years ago the United States was a Nation of a few million people scattered along the Atlantic seacoast. These people were almost entirely engaged in agriculture. Each community lived pretty much to itself, having very little contact with the outside world. There were no problems of industry or of labor, because there was no factory system and little industry of any kind. Today, 148 years later, we are no longer strictly an agricultural Nation. We are a great industrial Nation spread over 3,000 miles of continent. Our communities are no longer independent, each going its own separate way. We are today one unit, and what affects one portion of our population affects all portions. Price levels in New York affect price levels in Kansas. Unemployment in Alabama affects wages in Michigan. The point is that what were local problems in 1787 and could be handled by local action are today national problems and demand national attention.

Can anyone deny that the problems of industry and of labor, of agriculture, of commerce, and of mining are national problems? It must be admitted by all that these are national problems, and it stands to reason that national action is necessary to their solution. Of course, there may be some that will contend that there are no problems of labor or of industry that need attention, but I submit that in the face of the millions of unemployed in this Nation, in the face of those thousands of men and women who have faced starvation during the past half dozen years, anyone who contends that no action is necessary is simply blind to the realities of our economic life. And allow me to reiterate that it is the position of the Democratic Party that provision must be made, whether by interpretation or by amendment, to allow the National Government to act.

It is only by national action that it is possible to work out a program of unemployment insurance or of old-age pensions. Only by national action can child labor and the sweatshop be eliminated. Only by national action can a system of retirement for the railroad workers be worked out. Only by national action can the laborers of America be protected in their right to organize. Only by national action can the farmers of our Nation be given anything like a just reward for their services. In general, let me say that only by national action can our social-economic system be made to operate in the interest of the common man.

Let me caution you that you will be told that the Democrats are wrecking the Constitution. You will be told that the Constitution must be protected at all costs. You must not be misled by such propaganda. The Democrats regard the Constitution as highly as do the Republicans. Ex-President Hoover, the hermit of Palo Alto, has no monopoly on the ability to appreciate the work of the men who made the Constitution or to understand the significance of what these men did. Do not let anyone tell you that the Constitution has never been changed. It has been changed in innumerable ways. It has been amended 21 times, and it is because the fathers of the Constitution foresaw the necessity for change that they made provision for the amendment of the Constitution.

To expand the powers of the National Government will not mean the discarding of the Constitution. These powers have been added to before. There was a time when the National Government could not levy an income tax because the Constitution gave it no power to do so. The Constitution was changed, it was amended to give that power, and I do not believe that any of us would want that power taken away today. This addition of power did not wreck the Constitution, and neither will the Constitution be wrecked if the National Government is given power to insure the worker and the farmer a square deal.

In a democracy the sovereign power rests with the people, and in the United States, if the people want to add to the powers of their National Government, they are free to do so. The Constitution was made for the people, not the people for the Constitution.

The issue is not whether we are going to discard the Constitution or not. The constitutional issue that you are going to decide is this: Do you want the National Government to have power to deal with the problems of industry, agriculture, labor, mining, and commerce, or do you not? It is really a question of whether you believe that the problems of unemployment, the problems of farm bankruptcy—all these problems that are bothering us today—are problems that need the attention of the National Government. You must decide that question first, and if you believe that these problems need national attention, then the solution of the constitutional question is easy. You will be willing to give the National Government power to solve the national problems.

I warn you not to be misled by the propaganda that would lead you to believe that the Democrats are destroying the Constitution. Really we are trying to save the Constitution. We are trying, my friends, to save the basic principles of the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States is founded on the implicit principle that this Nation shall be one of equal opportunity for all; that this shall be a Nation of people protected in their rights of free speech and a free press, and the right to worship as they please. Our Constitution was based on those principles stated in its preamble:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to establish a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

These are the principles upon which the program of the Democratic Party is based. These are principles that put human values and rights above the rights of property and wealth. And I suggest to you that the Republican Party, sponsoring as it does the rights of property and of wealth, is the party that would wreck the Constitution and destroy its basic principles. The Democratic Party has but one aim and one purpose—to make the United States a more secure place in which to live, to establish homes, and to bring up our children. This aim coincides with the very spirit of the Constitution. Our Republican friends may believe that it will destroy the Constitution to give economic security to the American people. I challenge them to prove their contention.

GROVER CLEVELAND

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert therein a speech on President Cleveland delivered by my colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. Celler].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Representative EMANUEL CELLER, Democrat, of New York, over the Columbia Broadcasting System Tuesday, March 17, at 10:45 p. m., eastern standard time. Representative CELLER's address was in connection with a special program presented by the Grover Cleveland Memorial Committee. Mayor Fiorello LaGuardia, of New York City, and Gustavus A. Rogers, chairman of the committee, were the other speakers during the program. Representative CELLER spoke from the studios of WJSV, Columbia's station for the Nation's Capital:

Grover Cleveland held high office during a period that tried men's souls, when the furies churned by the Civil War were developing most dangerous sectional antagonisms, when the too excessive and rapid national expansion was causing intense class hatred. It took a man of rock-ribbed firmness and indomitable courage to hold in check these discordant social elements. Cleveland's honesty, fearlessness, and common sense saved the Nation in those troubled days—now called the Cleveland era.

General Bragg, at the Chicago convention that gave Cleveland his first nomination for the Presidency, stated: "They love him for the enemies he has made." That is the best and most telling epitome of his character. He was the avowed foe of unscrupulous money changers and grasping monopolists. To graft and political chicanery he never offered quarter.

It was his duty, as sheriff of Erie County, N. Y., to hang men condemned. That task had always been delegated to an underling. Not so—Cleveland. He would not ask another to do his job, especially one so hateful. Although sick at heart and mayhap quivering from head to foot, he attended to the hanging and sprang the trap himself. All his life he performed his obligations to the letter. He demanded no less from others. That is why he was disliked by dishonest Government contractors and by the money tycoons of his day, by selfish politicians who sought to prey upon the Nation.

He never failed to recognize his own shortcomings. In 1886, Harvard College celebrated its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary. Cleveland was invited to attend and receive an honorary degree. He hesitated to accept. He was told he would be simply following the usual practice of former Presidents when visiting Cambridge—even the unpolished Andrew Jackson, much to the disgust of John Quincy Adams, had not hesitated—but Cleveland said with becoming modesty that his education was meager. He could not mask as a man of letters. That would be deceitful. He felt he was not, therefore, a suitable candidate. Although he attended the anniversary and spoke, he declined the honorary degree.

Cleveland held most sacred the Jeffersonian guaranty of religious freedom. He felt that if this right was impinged upon, no constitutional right was safe. In 1885 he appointed a Catholic, A. M. Kelley, of Virginia, to be Minister to Austria-Hungary. The Emperor Franz Joseph, mouthpiece of bigots, held Kelley to be persona non grata because his wife was a Jewess. When Cleveland learned of this proscription he was infuriated. I can well picture him pounding with his fist the desk with a vehemence all the more enhanced because of his bulk, and saying, "Franz Josef will take Kelley with his Jewish wife, or I will be dashed if I send anyone else."

How refreshing, in the face of the tragic religious persecutions by that brute, Hitler, to read Cleveland's strictures upon such bigotry, which appear, in part, in his first annual message to Congress: "The reasons advanced were such as could not be acquiesced in without violation of my oath of office and the precepts of the Constitution . . . and required such an application of religious test as a qualification for office under the United States as would have resulted in the practical disenfranchisement of a large class of our citizens and the abandonment of a vital principle of our Government."

To clinch the idea that he meant business on the matter of religious rights and that he wanted the world to know it, he subsequently appointed Oscar S. Strauss, a Jew, as Minister to Turkey.

In 1887, Cleveland began a frontal attack upon the iniquitous high tariff. His advisors cautioned him. Protectionist States would turn away from him. His reelection would be imperiled. But with him it was "damn the torpedoes; full steam ahead." He said, "What is the use of being elected, and reelected, unless you stand for something?" With quiet firmness, he sent his message to Congress. It contributed largely to his subsequent defeat. He proved he would "rather be right than be President." He proved himself a statesman.

We do indeed do ourselves proud to honor the memory of this great and good man by suitable monument in this, the Nation's Capitol—this man who scrupulously followed his own admonition, "A public office is a public trust."

TENANTS MUST GET A BREAK, EVEN IF TUGWELL DID GET A COLLEGE DEGREE—RURAL RESETTLEMENT DESCRIBED

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, the Nation has been washed with a billion barrels of bilge about "Tugwellian philosophy" from critics who know nothing of Tugwell and have nothing to offer except words. Great economic questions we settle by resorting to personalities. So I am going into "personalities" and talk about "brain trusters" in general and Tugwell in particular, then I will say something about the Rural Resettlement Administration, of which he is the administrator.

The Republicans, who have lately hired a curious assortment of "brain trusters" of their own, have been yowling about the Democratic "brain trust" for 3 years. In the meantime the Democratic "brain trusters" have had some real good, hard experience, and now the Republicans go get a new set of green academicians from north, south, east, west, and from over the cuckoo's nest.

ABOUT THAT "BRAIN TRUST"

In one sense the Democratic "brain trust" never existed. It is true that Moley, Berle, Tugwell, and others were asked to come to Washington to put at the disposal of the administration the benefits of their long years of study and research in the economic problems facing us 3 years ago. And it is true that a great deal has been said and written about their personal attributes, the color of their neckties, their habits—it has even been alleged one has clean fingernails—but what has been said about their work? What, for instance, is known about the Resettlement Administration, which Tugwell has spent this past year organizing and running?

Let us discuss Tugwell personally for a minute. In the first place, he has taken more criticism in the last 3 years than any man in the administration, and few have stood up to say a good word for him.

He came to Washington under the worst possible circumstances, with every Republican—and some good Democrats—denouncing him as a "college professor and a Communist"—usually used as synonymous. He had to take over the odds and ends of four other departments and relief agencies and whip together a new organization to handle one of the toughest jobs in the country. At every step he has had to fight a storm of abuse, which pictured him as some kind of wild man from Moscow.

Now, I have no special affection for "brain trusters", and the Resettlement Administration has not spent a penny in my district. Last summer, however, I got a chance to spend about 10 days with Tugwell, traveling around through Texas and Mexico, and I discovered that he was just about as human as anybody. He talks the American language. He reacts the same way to food, drink (coffee and so forth), and fatigue, and when he gets a beating he gets sore just like anybody else.

Rex is a good deal like the possums we used to catch when I was a kid on the farm. We would throw the possum into an old empty water barrel and poke him with sticks until he got somewhat irritated. Then when some boy came along and tried to lift him out of the barrel by his tail, he was pretty sure to get his hand bitten. Tugwell has been mauled around so much that he sometimes snaps back. He would not be human if he did not. On the other hand, if he ever was a doctor, he has been beat around so much he has learned how to take it; the doctor-fuzz has about worn off, and he has learned to be a good administrator.

But which is the more important, Tugwell or the Resettlement Administration; the lives and welfare of millions of farmers or abuse of an individual, even though he has been a professor with a couple of degrees? The answers are all obvious. Let us therefore consider the work of the Resettlement Administration, which Tugwell has established and is directing.

SIX MILLION FARM FAMILIES ASSISTED

He inherited parts of 4 distinct Federal agencies and more than 40 State rehabilitation corporations. He cut down administrative overhead by at least one-third, and he vastly increased the load carried by the old organizations. At the present time, over 600,000 farm families are being assisted by this Administration.

IS ADMINISTRATION EFFICIENT?

You hear it charged that the Resettlement Administration harbors inefficiency. An impartial comparison of the internal workings of this new agency with other emergency agencies and with older Government departments, the results of which have recently appeared in the press, make it plain that the work of consolidating the Resettlement Administration into a unified, driving, efficient arm of the Government has been largely achieved. Let me cite you here relevant parts of these articles appearing in the Washington Daily News a few days ago. I quote:

It is harder to get a job in the Resettlement Administration than in any other New Deal agency, with the exception of T. V. A.; Resettlement is the stingiest of all non-civil-service organizations in the matter of salaries.

This is the opinion of a majority of old-line personnel experts who have first-hand knowledge of Resettlement's procedure.

Resettlement is the only emergency agency which lets the Civil Service Commission dictate its salaries in Washington.

An unbiased, composite opinion, gathered from veteran Government officials in close contact with Resettlement, pictures the agency in this fashion: It started out under handicaps unprecedented in the Federal service and after acute disorder and dissension, has emerged as the equal in efficiency of the old A. A. A. organization. It is better than N. R. A. ever was, and not so good as some of the smaller establishments, such as T. V. A.

WORK ESSENTIAL, TUGWELL OR NO

The work the Resettlement Administration is doing is essential to this country, whether Tugwell is in the set-up or not. Many changes have combined to cause farm life in America to be entirely different from what it was even 20 years ago. We have lost a good part of our foreign markets, perhaps forever. The old pattern of independent land-owning farmers is now rapidly disappearing. The land runs together in larger blocks, and millions of landless tenants and croppers till the soil. Corporation farming threatens many of the independent owners who are still in possession of their land. With the growth of dependency in the country, the Nation loses a fundamental political strength.

There are millions of persons who live in cities, who have no land whatever, and who are possessed of next to nothing. Similar people in European countries are no worse off than millions of our own people. And we might as well be frank and face the fact that we have 12,000,000 people in this country who do not know how to read and write, who are adults.

RURAL POVERTY INCREASING IN NEW ENGLAND, NORTH, AND WEST

Land tenancy and rural poverty are worst in the southern part of the United States, but the condition has a long history in the rest of the country. It is now almost as great in the Middle West as in the South. Today nearly 15,000,000 farm people belong to tenant families. Here are the figures for the growth of tenant families during the last 5 years in Northern and Midwestern States:

Iowa	8,536
Ohio	16,166
Indiana	8,934
Illinois	10,374
Michigan	11,139
Wisconsin	8,164
Minnesota	10,774
Missouri	19,947

Tenancy is not growing as rapidly as this in the Southern States. It is surprising, but farm tenancy has been showing a marked increase in New England and the Eastern States during the last few years. The blight has grown in every State in the Union except four.

BROKEN FAMILIES AND RUINED LANDS GIVEN LIFE

These facts have a physical basis.

Our land is literally being shot out from under us, at the rate of 300 billion tons of soil a year. Already wind and water erosion has completely destroyed an area almost as large as the four States of Illinois, Ohio, Maryland, and North Carolina, and has stripped the topsoil off that much more. It took nature 4,000 years to build that soil. We threw it away in one lifetime. Altogether erosion has cost this Nation about 10 billion dollars, or almost as much as the entire war debt. That is a capital loss, and we can never get it back. In other words, this country has been squandering its heritage like a drunken cowboy spends his pay check, and we are just now beginning to realize how much the spree has cost us.

Through the Resettlement Administration, the American people are making their first efforts to stop these losses. The job is well under way, and any administration, Republican or Democratic, will have to keep on with it, no matter what men or what party may be in power.

PROGRAM OF RESETTLEMENT ADMINISTRATION

The long-term objectives of the Resettlement Administration are plain. Sooner or later it hopes to take about 100 million acres of submarginal land out of cultivation, and put it back into forest or grass. Working hand in hand with other Government agencies, it is trying to rescue 60 million acres of devastated timberland, and to nail down the flying soil in the dust bowl of the Southwest.

This indicates that 650,000 families will have to move or be moved away from land which is exhausted, or which should never have been brought under the plow. There is no longer an open frontier where these people can stake out new homesteads, and most of them have not got the money to move even if the frontier were there. Thousands of them, especially in the South, are lucky if they own a hound dog and a corn-shuck mattress. It is up to the Government to help them establish new homes, where they can make a decent American living.

THE JOB UNDER WAY

That is a big order and it may take the best part of a century to carry it out. Tugwell seems to have started the job in a cautious and sensible way, and so far he has made amazing progress. Right now the Resettlement Administration is engaged in buying up 9,000,000 acres of submarginal land scattered through 42 States. This property is being rebuilt into parks, forests, game preserves, and grazing land. Each one of the 206 land utilization projects is designed to stop erosion and put the soil to its best economic use. At every step Resettlement is cooperating with State and Federal agencies, such as the Soil Conservation Service and the State agricultural colleges. It has provided jobs for 70,000 relief workers. Some are building check dams and terraces to help save the most important asset this country owns; all are doing important work of absolutely necessary conservation.

There are about 17,000 families now living on the land to be retired. A few of these are able to buy or lease new farms without any help from the Government. The Resettlement Administration is trying to take care of the rest of them in a variety of ways. In some cases it is selling them new property on easy terms. In other parts of the country it is establishing subsistence homesteads, where the residents can spend part of their time working in factories and part in farming.

Here and there it is setting up new rural communities, where houses, schools, and utilities can be economically grouped together. Usually the settlers rent their new homes, with options to buy. Most of the money invested eventually will be returned to the Federal Treasury. Ninety resettlement projects have either been completed or are under construction, and 60 others are under preparation. More than 14,000 people already have been helped to make a new start in life on these resettlement projects.

SUBMARGINAL LANDS COST COUNTIES TOO MUCH

Whenever the Resettlement Administration takes a submarginal acre out of cultivation, it is saving cash money for the State and county. The average submarginal farm costs the local government a good deal more than it ever pays back in taxes. One typical county has been spending 13 times as much to maintain the roads to its submarginal farms as they pay back in revenue. In another county 28 stranded families have been costing local taxpayers $185 per household a year merely for the transportation of their children to and from school. These families paid an average of $10.80 apiece in taxes. In other words, they have been receiving a subsidy of $5,000 a year for school-bus service alone.

In addition to its rural resettlement projects, the organization is building four suburban communities on the outskirts of crowded industrial cities. They are intended to demonstrate how city workers can be provided with modern low-rental homes in country surroundings. These 4 projects alone will give jobs to more than 20,000 relief laborers this summer, and when they are finished each community will furnish homes for from 750 to 1,000 families. They are typical examples of the way Resettlement is giving the Nation permanent assets in return for money spent on relief.

Here are the beginnings of a long-range, national program of conservation and resettlement, and, whether Tugwell lives or dies, that character of work must be done. The work which Tugwell is doing helps people whose voice we hear seldom in this House, so naturally he gets plenty of criticism. But the purposes are essential and he personally is doing a good job.

ADMINISTRATION SAVES FARM FAMILIES

At the same time, the Resettlement Administration is carrying out an emergency program, designed to take farming folks off the relief rolls as soon as possible. Under the old F. E. R. A., the Government kept about 1,000,000 rural families alive by a direct dole. They scraped along just this side of starvation, without any hope of getting back on their own feet.

These people were turned over to Resettlement last summer, and since then more than half a million of them have been rehabilitated into self-supporting families. In most cases, all they needed was a loan of from $50 to $600 to buy seed and livestock and tools. The average loan is slightly less than the average cost to keep a family on relief for a year, and most of the money paid out in loans will come back to the Government. The rehabilitation work has been so successful that already $11,000,000 of these loans have been repaid. Every time Resettlement boosts one of these cases off the relief rolls, it saves money to the taxpayer, and saves the self-respect of an American family.

Another way to help bankrupt farmers is to lift some of the old debt load off their backs. The Resettlement Administration has served as a go-between to help the farmer negotiate debt adjustments with his creditors. In the last 6 months, Resettlement has worked out reductions of $12,750,000 on a total indebtedness of $46,480,000.

A FEW EXAMPLES OF REHABILITATION

Most of the people who get resettlement help are hard-working Americans who have been forced to the wall by 6 years of depression. Just for an example, Leo Boller, of Sidell, Ill. He won first prize at the Chicago International Livestock Exposition in 1913 and 1914, and was crowned corn king of Illinois in both those years. Thirty-cent wheat broke Boller, just like it has broken hundreds of other first-rate farmers. He lost his land and just managed to keep his family from starving. In 1934 he got a $704 rehabilitation loan from the Government, and today he is back on his feet and farm making money.

Another typical case is R. C. Harrison, a war veteran with a large family, living in Hernando County, Fla. The Government helped him lease a farm and supplied him with a mule, cow, and wagon. He wrote Resettlement the other day to say that he had new faith in the country and that his family is going to stay off the relief rolls.

The Resettlement Administration is putting strong props under American agriculture, the weakest spot in our whole economic system. It is taking farm families off the dole and setting them up where they can make a respectable living. In so doing it makes a new market for the industries of the whole country. It is providing useful jobs for thousands of relief workers. Most important of all, Resettlement is making the first intelligent effort in the history of the United States to save the land this Nation is built on. Every Democrat can be proud of its record of accomplishment; and every citizen of this country can be satisfied that the work is essential to our national life.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I made before the Board of Army Engineers on flood control yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me in connection with the hearing on flood control for central-southern New York and northern Pennsylvania before the United States Army Board of Engineers at Washington, March 18, 1936:

I

The immediate need of the counties of central and southern New York and northern Pennsylvania for flood-control works has been established by the field report of the Army Engineers which is being considered before this Board today.

1. The need is so acute that the engineers in their report have declared the areas within the 1935 flood line should be designated as danger zones and no new construction should be undertaken inside of those zones until the full program of flood-control works recommended in their report has been carried out.

There was no doubt of this need when the President of the United States authorized this survey. It had been established by the death and destruction which swept the important industrial, agricultural, and residential sections embraced within this report on July 7, 8, and 9.

The floods rose in New York State; they swept into Pennsylvania. The very Executive order which authorized the survey recognized the Federal nature of the task.

Late in January, long before this report was submitted, the Governor of the State of New York inquired of the President of the United States as to what expedition might be expected on the report of the engineers, pointing out that speed would be necessary if proper action were to be had out of this session of Congress for Federal authorization and appropriation.

I want to read to you what the President of the United States wrote to the Governor of the State of New York in answer to his inquiry, as the letter was made public by Governor Lehman and generally published February 5, 1936:

"MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I have your letter of January 23, in which you ask that the report of the War Department on the flood-control survey which it is now undertaking in southern New York and eastern Pennsylvania, be expedited so that it can receive consideration during the present session of Congress.

"I recall the disastrous floods of last July, which led to my approval of an allotment of $200,000 from the relief appropriations so that the survey could be placed under way last September, to obtain the information necessary in the preparation of a plan for adequate control measures.

"I am advised by the Chief of Engineers that the field work has been completed recently, and the final plans are now in course of preparation. The field report is expected in his office about February 15, 1936, for review by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, as required by law, prior to its submission to Congress.

"He assures me that the action of the Board will be expedited, and the report submitted to Congress in ample time to receive consideration during the present session.

"He will advise you direct when the report is ready for submission to Congress, so that your representatives may have the opportunity to examine it in detail.

"Very sincerely yours,

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

Now, there cannot be any doubt as to what the intent and the expectation of Mr. Roosevelt was at the time to which he refers concerning his approval of the allotment for the survey.

And there can be no doubt as to what he intended the Governor of the State of New York, and the people of the State of New York, to believe when he said, speaking of the Chief of Engineers—

"He assures me that the action of the Board will be expedited and the report submitted to Congress in ample time to receive consideration during the present session."

Consideration for what? Consideration for rejection? Why all the haste if the President of the United States did not expect a report favoring adequate participation by the Federal Government? If no such report were expected, it wouldn't make much difference whether this session or any session of Congress got it.

The Governor of the State of New York was so pleased about it that he made the President's letter public.

That letter has been publicly interpreted in dozens of publications and by dozens of speakers, Democratic and Republican alike, as meaning that the Congress of the United States was going to do something about this situation in a State which for years has been contributing one-fifth of the moneys expended in flood control in other parts of the United States, not one penny of which has ever been spent by direct appropriation on Federal flood control in the State of New York.

I say that this interpretation has been general and public, and at no time has the President of the United States or the Governor of New York State attempted to indicate that the interpretation was wrong in any respect. If the intention were not as it has been described and interpreted, both of them have had plenty of time to correct any public misapprehension. On the contrary, the Governor of the State of New York has encouraged the Legislature of the State of New York to go through with a program of State legislation which first and last is predicated upon the idea of Federal participation.

II

The United States Government has spent $374,117,092.04 on flood control in various parts of the United States and Alaska.

1. Some time ago I telephoned General Pillsbury and asked him for the official figures on total expenditure for flood control under the supervision of the engineering department during the past 25 years. This is the table of expenditures with which he provided me:

Mississippi River and tributaries.....	$336,965,583.32
Emergency work on tributaries of the Mississippi River.....	3,582,707.54
Sacramento River, Calif.....	14,994,547.87
Muskingum Valley reservoirs, Ohio.....	1,885,941.76
Rio Grande, Tex.....	41,833.84
Lowell Creek, Alaska.....	109,688.87
Salmon River, Alaska.....	27,445.10
Plant.....	16,509,343.74
Total.....	374,117,092.04

Compared with the sums which have been spent in the past few years by the Federal Government, that is not a large amount. I suspect that it has been more profitably spent than a great many other millions of dollars which have gone into enterprises and experiments nowhere near so valuable or so important.

III

To that total the State of New York has contributed approximately one-fifth, nearly $75,000,000 in round figures, because the State of New York pays 20.38 percent of the total sums which go into the maintenance of the Federal Government and the expenditure of Federal funds for various purposes throughout the United States.

IV

The industrial importance of the State of New York is commensurate with its importance as a taxpaying member of the Union.

You are being shown here today an industrial map of the United States. It does not look much like the map of the United States which we have come to know from our childhood days with the school geographies. A great many of the States are compressed to wafer-like layers, and other States, like Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, are way out of shape, way out of proportion to the rest of the country, as the rest of the country is usually considered in geographical dimensions.

But if you were to make a tax map of the United States of America, the State of New York would occupy one-fifth of the entire area.

V

By comparison the State of New York is entitled to a far larger sum for flood control than is declared to be necessary in this report of the Army Engineers, and certainly it is entitled to much more than this $15,000,000 figure of justifiable economic outlay which is reached by some formula or another in this report.

1. Just as a matter of equality and justice, just as a matter of being fair, the State which has paid for one-fifth of all the flood-control work done in the continental United States during the past 25 years is entitled to consideration from the Federal Government.

There is no need in my calling your attention to the fact that the greater part of this $374,000,000 has been spent in flood-control measures in States which on this industrial map are slivers as compared with the great industrial and tax-paying block which represents the State of New York.

We have no quarrel with what has been spent in those States; we are not here to raise the question as to whether or not it was economically justified. We do not assume to apply to these non-industrial States the yardstick which must of necessity be applied to a great industrial State like New York. As a matter of fact, we insist that the yardstick applied to these other States does not fit the case of New York State at all. And we insist, too, that a State which has paid for one-fifth of all of the flood-control work done in the United States of America in the past 25 years should not have to come with its hat in its hand to any agency of Federal Government and beg for ordinary economic justice.

W. P. A. WORK RELIEF UNWISELY ADMINISTERED

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is something wrong with the administration of public relief and with the method of selecting men for work on W. P. A. projects. Everyone knows that millions upon millions of dollars have been wasted. I could cite many instances of this kind of waste, but the purpose of these few remarks is to set forth the unfairness resulting from the regulations issued by the Public Works Administration as they apply to the men eligible to work on these projects and those ineligible to work.

At the present time many more men are employed under W. P. A. than under P. W. A. projects. Under present regulations controlling the employment of men on W. P. A. projects 90 percent of all men employed must come from the relief rolls. This is as it should be, but the trouble is that there are many people sorely in need of relief who are not getting it and who are not on the relief rolls and cannot get on the relief rolls. The regulations provide that no person can get work on W. P. A. projects unless he can show that he was on relief some time between the 1st of May 1935 and the 1st of November 1935. This means that those who were on relief during this time are to be greatly favored, although they might be able to get along without relief; and those who were not on relief at that time, regardless of how badly they need it now, cannot get it. This is a very unfair and unreasonable regulation. It is unfair to many who have done their best to stay off of relief, and when they have exhausted all means of support and have done the best they possibly can do they are punished for it by being denied relief which they so sorely need and to which they are entitled.

This long period of depression has tested the souls of our people like nothing else that has come into our national life except war. Many deserving persons, both men and women, who never thought the time would come when they must seek public relief have been compelled to seek it, and even more have been very thankful to receive it. Many have fought it off at the price of hunger and have strained their self-respect in order to provide their families with food. Many of these people are our best citizens. They have done their best, and they are entitled to relief. In our great country we have maintained that it is not proper for a person to take the position that the Government owes him a living. But it is generally considered that when an honorable law-abiding citizen has done the very best he can to provide for his family and fails because of ill health or unemployment, the public should see to it that he and his family do not want for the common necessities of life. Therefore, I say that it is very discouraging for a man to suffer in an effort to keep off of relief and to suffer more when he finds he has lost his all and that he is not eligible to public relief because he fails to ask for it when he was able to do without it. There is nothing that will encourage dissatisfaction with one's country like the knowledge that the country will not defend and protect its citizens when adversity overtakes them. On the other hand, there is nothing encourages patriotism like the thought that comes to one who has done his best for his country, that that country will do for him when adversity overtakes him. Our relief policy therefore discourages patriotism and encourages dissatisfaction.

We often hear complaints to the effect that there are many persons employed on these W. P. A. projects who are not deserving of help and who have plenty. No doubt there is much truth in these statements, while again there is much misrepresentation with reference to the matter. It is true that there are many persons engaged on these projects who are well able financially to get along without help. They should be removed promptly. They should be dismissed and censured for their greed, and it might not be unreasonable if they could be brought before a court for an explanation. Let us hope that there are not many of these. There is one class, though, that is now on relief that is frequently unjustly criticized. There are many on relief who would be glad to go off relief if they could, and would get off occasionally, but they are afraid that when they do get off they will not be able to get back on again. I have had many men tell me that this is their case. There are many who before May 1, 1935, went off relief to accept temporary work, believing they could be returned to the rolls when they had finished their work, but they were sadly disappointed when they were denied this privilege. Many of these men are now destitute and desperate. They did what appeared to be the right thing, and which was the right thing, and now they find that if they had cheated they would be eligible to selection for W. P. A. work.

I have made every possible effort to have these regulations changed. I maintain that necessity for relief is a present condition. The fact that a person once had plenty does him no good when he is hungry. Hunger cannot be satisfied with the food that was consumed last May. Tennyson says, "Sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things." Likewise hunger is not satisfied by the knowledge that some time in the future food might arrive. I repeat, relief is a present condition and demands present action. Failure to recognize this fact just because it will disrupt the plan of relief is only a flimsy excuse. This unfair discrimination against honest and worthy people will never be removed until every man's case is considered upon its own merits. Of course, some general regulations are necessary; but when regulations work hardships, then we have an example of what is intended to be law becoming bureaucracy and tyranny.

I have heretofore made speeches on this subject before Congress, and I have had the matter up with Harry Hopkins, the Works Progress Administrator, but to no avail as yet. I intend to keep hammering on this injustice until a change is made. I invite the assistance of all other Congressmen who agree with me. Likewise I invite the assistance of all sincere Americans who agree with me, and there are millions of them. We all oppose wasteful extravagance, but we all maintain that the worthy needy must be cared for, and that the great majority of our people prefer to work if they can get it, and that the work should be divided among the deserving as their needs appear, without regard to whether they were on relief between May 1, 1935, and November 1, 1935. When a man and his family need help that is the time to help them.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. ROBINSON. I request the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I ask that there be assigned to the vacancies on behalf of the majority on the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, of course I have nothing to say about vacancies in the Democratic representation on committees or how they may be filled, but I should like to ask the Senator if the assignments now suggested conform to the proportion of Democrats and Republicans on committees which has been agreed upon?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does. There are two Democratic vacancies on the committee, and I am merely asking that they be filled.

Mr. McNARY. How many Republicans are on the committee?

Mr. ROBINSON. There are two.

Mr. McNARY. And the request of the Senator from Arkansas, if agreed to, will make how many Democrats?

Mr. ROBINSON. It will make five.

Mr. McNARY. That works out the proportion heretofore agreed to, and I have no objection.

THE LATE SENATOR HUEY P. LONG

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on January 22 the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] delivered in the Senate an eloquent tribute to the memory of one of our former colleagues, the late Senator Huey P. Long.

On that occasion I made a brief statement, and intended at the time to ask the Senate for permission to have printed in connection with my remarks a copy of the eloquent funeral oration delivered at the grave of Senator Long by the Reverend Gerald L. K. Smith.

I now ask unanimous consent to have a copy of the oration printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oklahoma is granted.

The address referred to is as follows:

FUNERAL ORATION DELIVERED OVER THE GRAVE OF HUEY PIERCE LONG, BY
GERALD L. K. SMITH, SEPTEMBER 12, 1935

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. (John 15:13.)

The lives of great men do not end with the grave. They just begin. This place marks not the resting place of HUEY PIERCE LONG, it marks only the burial ground for his body. His spirit shall not rest as long as hungry bodies cry for food, as long as lean human frames stand naked, as long as homeless wretches haunt this land of plenty.

His affection for these sufferers was stronger than the flesh and is as everlasting as the soul. Hatred cannot touch him now; malice cannot reach him more. He sleeps in the shadow of the spire which he gave the sky, sepulchred close by this emblem which he raised.

He fell in the line of duty. He died for us. This tragedy fires the breast of every comrade. This untimely death makes restless the souls of us who adored him. We cannot be appeased by flattery, we cannot be set at ease by superficial consolation. The ideals which he planted in our hearts have created a gnawing hunger for a new order. This hunger pain, this parching thirst for better things can only be healed and satisfied by the completion of that victory toward which he led us.

To summarize the influence and the noble attributes of this man is as though one went out to measure the boundary of a lake only to discover that he was on the arm of an ocean. In him there was no touch of religious prejudice, but at all times a warm, deep faith in God.

In answer to a query which I made in his home one Sunday he replied: "I know, Brother Smith, that the arms of God are about me every moment."

Can it be that God consented to this fate in order that by this dramatic exit he might retire from the battleground of political torture to find the quiet of eternity, while at the same time his torch was left to light our way?

In him there was no trace of racial antipathy. Mental wizard was this man, and we who hovered close to him never ceased to marvel at the instinctive, intuitive workings of this mental giant. Social crusader, thinking at all times of victory and power only as they related to a better social order. Educational statesman, determined that his children and the children of his neighbors should not be handicapped as he was. Political genius, so much so that his passing, so they think, has relieved the arch-enemies of his crusade the world around. An orator supreme, speaking the words of the masses in campaigns and at the same time recording in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of senatorial addresses supreme in rhetoric, artistic in style, permanent in value.

A statesman true, whose leadership led out so far ahead that short-sighted contemporaries were unable to see the star which he followed.

A tender father, a loving husband, lost to a family willing to give him up for the sake of his broader calling. A loyal friend, whose memory of tasks well done seemed flawless.

A musical heart that loved the songs of the common people and revealing a talent that for want of time lacked full expression. A writer with a pen that could warm the soul, comfort the body, and fire the imagination.

He knew not the definition of disloyalty. He was a builder, a trail blazer, a ruthless foe of delay, a burner of red tape, a violent enemy of retrogression. Progress was the sweetheart of his soul. He divorced the past, he wedded the present, he wooed the future. He was the personification of intellectual courage, a masterful dynamo of personality. A symbol of the mass mind, he reacted normally to the cries and to the pains and to the psychology of the common people.

The Bible was his favorite text. Its truth to him, profound authority. Drama was his natural art. A humorist of superior quality. An actor whose stage was his work, whose scenery, the people about him. When he passed by all eyes were fastened on him, watching tensely to see something that had never been seen before, listening intently for something that had never been said before, and he never disappointed.

To you, the aged father, your loins produced a giant of history, whose mother will always live through the boundless influence of her illustrious son.

To you, the relatives, close and removed, three generations hence your descendants will boast of your kinship to this fallen hero.

To you, the beloved wife, comrade in a million struggles, sufferer in a thousand defeats, rejoicer in 10,000 victories, be comforted in the knowledge that every moment of the remainder of your life you will have the memory of tasks well done, of services sacrificially performed, and of prophecies yet to be fulfilled.

To you, sweet children, your tender offspring, forever will the words of your great father be engraved on the tablet pages of the indestructible book of history.

To you, the officials of state, the companions of political strategy, crusaders in a common cause, count memorable the day you first heard the mention of his name. The time will come when to say that you even touched his hand will be the most potent interest in your life.

This blood which dropped upon this soil shall seal our hearts together. Take up the torch, complete the task, subdue selfish ambition, sacrifice for the sake of victory.

I was with him when he died. I said "Amen" as he breathed his last. His final prayer was this: "O God, don't let me die; I have a few things more to do." The work which he left undone we must complete. As one with no political ambition and who seeks no gratuities at the hand of the State, I challenge you, my comrades, to complete the task.

O God, why did we have to lose him?

With his removal from the arena of political activity it will no longer be necessary for any force to suppress liberal and accurate descriptions of his mighty work. Like other martyrs, from the moment of his death forth there will be an ever-widening and deepening understanding of the true greatness of this apostle of progress.

Some day the people will sit on the heights above their selfish prejudices and look upon the real man that he was. Some day they will know, some day they will understand.

Children of generations unborn will be rescued from drudgery, guarded against hunger, protected from ignorance because of the life and work of HUEY PIERCE LONG.

God willed, God ruled, God commanded Destiny to make him great. He was the victim of every form of persecution and abuse, struggling every moment of his public life under the cross of misrepresentation and the burden of misunderstanding, sacrificed to blind prejudice, but these only served in violation of precedent and convention to lift him higher and higher into the stratosphere of greatness. These tortures seemed to mark his course. They increased his necessity.

His unlimited talents invariably aroused the jealousies of those inferiors who posed as his equals. More than once—yea, many times—he has been the wounded victim of the Green Goddess; to use the figure, he was the Stradivarius, whose notes rose in competition with jealous drums, envious tom-toms. His was the unfinished symphony.

Out of the night that covers me,
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever gods may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced nor cried aloud:
Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody, but unbowed.

Beyond this place of wrath and tears
Looms but the horror of the shade;
And yet the menace of the years
Finds, and shall find, me unafraid.

It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

MEMORIALS

Mr. DAVIS presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 2573) to provide for the creation of a corporation to be known as United States Railways, to provide for the possession, control, and ownership of certain property of carriers by United States Railways, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 3363) to insure domestic tranquillity and to promote the general welfare by regulating and promoting commerce with foreign nations and among the States in commodities and industrial articles, to regulate the flow of such commerce, to prescribe the conditions under which corporations may engage in such commerce, to provide for the formation of corporations to engage in such commerce, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia (Pa.) Board of Trade, remonstrating against the enactment of the bill (S. 3154) making it unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to discriminate in price or terms of sale between purchasers of commodities of like grade and quality, to prohibit the payment of brokerage or commission under certain conditions, to suppress pseudo-advertising allowances, to provide a presumptive measure of damages in certain cases, and to protect the independent merchant, the public whom he serves, and the manufacturer from whom he buys, from exploitation by unfair competitors, which was ordered to lie on the table.

TAXATION OF CORPORATION SURPLUSES

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance a letter received from Mr. John N. Uhl, vice president of the Penn Tobacco Co., of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., I believe the letter, which pertains to the proposed tax on corporation surpluses, will be of interest to all who have to do with the proposed tax legislation and as well to the taxpayers of the country.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PENN TOBACCO CO.,
Wilkes-Barre, Pa., March 17, 1936.

HON. JAMES J. DAVIS,

3012 Massachusetts Avenue, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: Examination of the proposed taxes on the undistributed profits of corporations as reported in the press makes one wonder if the Government has not adopted as its motto the old biblical injunction, "To him that hath shall be given, and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath."

The corporations of the country are of all sizes from those with very trivial capital and business to enormous concerns which are almost monopolies in their lines. It is commonly understood that the law of corporation growth is divided into three stages. Most corporations begin in a rather small way and struggle along for a number of years establishing themselves as sound economic units. Then they begin a period of growth and expansion during which time they are increasing their markets both in respect to territory covered and variety of product and are developing their organization and their business to the limits of their economic possibilities.

The third and final stage represents the complete development or, in other words, the maturity of the corporation. During the second stage, while it is building, the corporation usually plows back all or nearly all of its earnings into its capital structure. By the time the final stage is reached it has all the capital that it needs and, therefore, devotes itself chiefly to holding the business it has secured and is able to distribute practically all of its earnings.

The large corporations of the country which are mainly in the third stage of development will, under the proposed laws, be relieved from the present taxes amounting to 15 or 16 percent on their income, and as most of them already pay out practically all their earnings, or can do so without hardship, they will not incur any new tax in place of the one from which they were relieved.

The small corporations of the country, however, which are in the second stage of development when they are plowing most all their income into their capital for the purpose of developing their business and competing with companies which are in the third stage of development, will be relieved of a tax amounting to 15 or 16 percent of their profits, and will have placed on them instead a tax amounting to as much as 33 1/4 percent.

In the tobacco industry there are four large companies who are in the third stage of development. These companies pay out practically all of their earnings in dividends, and have done so for a number of years past, so that the net result of the proposed laws would be to relieve them from 15 or 16 percent of tax which they now pay on their net income.

The other companies in the industry are in the second stage of development, and most of them are putting back a large part of their earnings into their capital and endeavoring to build themselves up in competition, of course, with the four large companies, as well as with each other. If these companies are now to have their taxes increased from 15 or 16 percent to 33 1/4 percent, while the large companies in the third stage of development are relieved of taxes entirely, the fate of the small companies seems almost inevitable, and it will be practically impossible for them to survive more than a few years.

This may seem like an exaggerated statement, but the fact is that the smoking- and chewing-tobacco business, which is the big end of the business operated by the smaller tobacco companies, is a declining business. The smaller companies in the second stage of development must bring out new brands of smoking and chewing tobacco or get into the cigarette business in order to keep up their volume and maintain their position or go ahead in the industry. It is necessary for them, therefore, to have a continuous supply of new capital. As soon as this supply of capital stops, their business gradually falls off and they eventually wind up in the business bone yard.

It is difficult for the plain businessman to understand the purpose of such laws as the proposed tax on undistributed corporation profits. The result of these laws will be to relieve a large number of the greatest corporations of the country which transact a large share of the business of the country from tax, thus reducing the income of the Government by that amount, and the amount must certainly be very large.

It seems strange, but apparently it is expected to recoup these taxes, of which the large corporations are relieved, from the smaller corporations and their stockholders. A few years ago it was considered not only good politics but wise and just that the larger, more matured corporations should bear their full share of Government burdens, and if anybody was to be favored, it should be the smaller corporations in the stage of growth and development. There was an idea prevalent that the welfare and progress of large numbers of small and medium-sized corporations was especially valuable to the country. We do not know, of course, what plans the Government may have in mind for these corporations who would be relieved of tax under the operation of the proposed laws, but so far as we can see it is now planned to put the entire tax burden on the smaller corporations.

We in the tobacco industry may be particularly sensitive on this subject because of a recent experience. You are familiar with the processing taxes and know that on tobacco products they amounted to very substantial sums and were an especially heavy burden on smoking and chewing tobaccos. They did not bear so heavily on cigarettes because of the wider margin of profit on that product. But it is the big companies of the industry in the third stage of development who do 90 to 95 percent of the cigarette business of the country. These companies also have a large volume of tobacco business. They did not raise their prices but absorbed the processing tax. Consequently, the smaller companies could not raise their prices, but were compelled to also absorb the processing tax. The result was that the smaller companies found the processing tax a very much heavier burden than the larger companies. In fact, in some lines of the tobacco industry the profit was practically wiped out, and in such a case, as you know, it would only be a matter of time until a company having such lines of business would be badly weakened, or would have to retire from business.

The large mature companies, with their profitable cigarette businesses, were in position to stand the drain of the processing taxes, and wait for the smaller companies to expire, when, of course, they would inherit such business as the small companies built up, which probably would compensate them for the taxes they had paid. If not, they could then raise their prices and recoup.

Competitively speaking, therefore, the processing tax was a great help to the big companies in the third stage of development and a hindrance to the smaller companies. Now the Government is proposing another form of tax which, upon analysis, is found to work in the same way.

We have no doubt that the situation is similar in other industries to what it is in the tobacco industry, and respectfully suggest that this is a matter of great importance to the country and should be given your most careful and earnest consideration.

Very truly yours,

PENN TOBACCO CO.,
JOHN N. UHL,
Vice President.

RELIEF OF FLOOD-STRICKEN AREAS IN PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, yesterday I submitted a resolution (S. Res. 259) providing for an appropriation from the general relief fund to the American Red Cross, and my colleague the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] presented a similar resolution (S. Res. 261). Both of us have been informed that the Red Cross does not care to have this action taken, so I ask that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions presented by my colleague and myself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the Red Cross is proceeding to raise funds by voluntary contributions.

Mr. DAVIS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that it is thought at this time that the necessary amount may be so received by the Red Cross and that a Federal appropriation may not be necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. As I understand, the Red Cross do not want to break their precedent of receiving voluntary contributions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Committee on Appropriations will be discharged from the further consideration of Senate Resolutions 259 and 261, and they will be indefinitely postponed.

FLOOD SUFFERERS—EDITORIAL FROM CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD an editorial from one of the big newspapers of the country, which seems to me to be of such a remarkable character that it should have wider circulation than that afforded by the subscribers to that newspaper.

The newspaper to which I refer is the Chicago Tribune. In effect, this editorial states that the greatest proportion of flood sufferers are themselves to blame for the plight in which they find themselves when their livestock is destroyed and their homes washed away and that they are entitled to no consideration or relief. In fact, the implication is that it would serve them right if they are left to drown.

This newspaper has specialized in assailing every relief measure offered by the Roosevelt administration. Apparently, its editor feels that people out of work should be allowed to starve, which is quite in keeping with the suggestion that when the rivers rise and their lives and property are imperiled nothing should be done for them—on the theory that they chose their own farms because the land is fertile and therefore should accept ruin or death as one of the normal perils of their business.

This newspaper pretends to represent and defend the property interests of this country and is particularly concerned with that group of property owners which constitute the Du Pont Liberty League. In the course of the political controversies incident to the approach of a national election, the supporters of the administration have charged this group with many faults of conduct and logic, but we never have gone to the length of accusing them of such inhumanity as is implied by this statement of their journalistic spokesman, that the proper way of handling the destitute and the unfortunate generally is to leave them to die rather than that they should receive aid from their Government.

With this brief statement, I offer the editorial and ask unanimous consent that it be included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Chicago Tribune of Mar. 7, 1936]

FLOODS

The expected floods have followed the first thaws and, as usual, the sob sisters have been crying that something must be done to relieve the innocent victims of nature's savagery. There will be more floods this spring, accompanied by more such appeals for charity.

The sob sisters neglect to say that the so-called innocent victims are, for the most part, prosperous farmers owning the fattest land in the United States. They deliberately chose the bottom lands because of their high fertility and correspondingly high yields. These farmers knew all about the flood danger when they acquired their holdings and actually counted upon an occasional inundation to maintain the fertility of the land. To regard such men as innocent victims of an unpredictable misfortune is to talk nonsense.

The bottom-land farmers should make their own preparations to meet the danger. Most of them do so by moving their families and as much of their property as can be moved to places of safety before the floods begin. A few are shiftless and wait to be rescued out of the treetops. Very little sympathy and money need be wasted upon them. They took a risk in the expectation of profit and did it with their eyes open. As they intend to keep the extra profits which come from bottom-land farms they expect to pay the price.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE SUPREME COURT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WALSH

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an able address by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] last evening in the Town Hall Forum, in New York City, on the subject The Constitution and the Supreme Court.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whenever a law, which has aroused sharp differences of opinion, is declared invalid by the Supreme Court, criticism of the Court and the power it exercises has invariably followed.

Neither the present criticisms of the Court nor the suggested remedies are new. They have been made in the past and will be made in the future by dissatisfied groups, whether Democrats or Republicans, wets or dries, progressives or conservatives, Communists or Socialists.

To my mind, in considering this subject, two conclusions are incontrovertible:

1. The Constitution of the United States reserves to the peoples of the several States all the powers and the absolute control of all their domestic affairs which were not explicitly conferred upon the Federal Government.

2. The Federal Government may acquire power which it does not now possess in one way only, through the ratification by the people of the several States of an amendment to the Constitution.

These propositions being conceded, where is the protection and to what tribunal or agency can the people or the several States turn for protection against the seizure of the States' reserved rights by the Federal Government? The Constitution, the accepted fundamental law of the land and innumerable precedents make the Supreme Court the tribunal to determine exactly what powers are and those that are not delegated to the Federal Government. To deny this power to the Supreme Court is to contend that the Congress itself has the unlimited right to say what powers it may exercise.

One group opposing this power in the Supreme Court desires to do this very thing, namely, make the Congress the sole judge of their powers in constitutional matters. To my mind, this position would scrap the entire Constitution and nullify all its provisions.

A second group, admitting that the Supreme Court is a proper tribunal to preserve the powers reserved to the States only, proposes various legislative means to curtail the exercise of this power. Among them are the requirements of a unanimous decision of the members of the Court to declare a statute invalid, or that at least seven of the Justices must so vote. This we will discuss hereafter.

A third group seeks to deny the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction in all cases except those in which original jurisdiction is granted to the Supreme Court in the Constitution. This would leave the Court's jurisdiction only over suits in which "States, ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls" are parties. The unsoundness of this position is manifest. If the appellate jurisdiction is taken away from the Supreme Court, the district courts would have jurisdiction to pass on the validity of laws passed by Congress, as the judicial power extends to cases involving the validity of such laws. The power of the district courts cannot be taken away, except by abolishing them. Abolition of these courts would be calamitous and disastrous, for there would be no agency to enforce the laws of Congress, except martial force. Unless the Supreme Court exercises appellate jurisdiction to review the actions of trial courts, there will be no remedy for lack of uniformity of decisions and chaos and confusion would result.

A fourth group suggests that the Supreme Court should retain jurisdiction to pass upon the validity of acts of Congress that involve only violations of the express prohibitions in the Constitution, namely, those embracing inalienable rights, 22 in number. This group, however, insists that the Congress shall be the sole judge of the validity of legislation touching "the general welfare, commerce among the States, taxation, the coinage of money", etc., and "due process of law."

The general welfare and commerce among the States involve purely regulatory powers, and, if unrestrained, with the suggested uncontrolled power to define due process of law, Congress could exceed its powers at will. There would be no way that individual citizens could prevent legislative encroachment upon their inalienable rights. This plan would abolish the Constitution by legislative enactment.

Having enumerated the changes proposed by the various groups protesting the existing powers of judicial review, let us consider what these groups say.

Briefly it is this: That it is inconceivable that the Supreme Court should have the power to declare acts passed by Congress and approved by the President to be in violation of the Constitution, for this permits the courts to thwart the will of the people expressed by their representatives in Congress and their President; that the exercise of this power by the Supreme Court gives it the power to control the Government; namely, to make laws and determine policies; and it is further argued that the control of the Government should not be confided to nine men, a mere majority of whom may hold within their power the well-being of the country as a whole.

The fallacy of this contention is that the Supreme Court does not make laws. It exercises a purely negative function. In declaring a law in violation of the Constitution, it is not thwarting the will of the people. The will of the people is as expressed in the Constitution. When they choose a President and Members of Congress they but express confidence in them—a confidence that Congress and the Executive will only act within the provisions of the Constitution. If Congress enacts legislation approved by the President which is in excess of their powers, it expresses the will of Congress and the President only.

If the Constitution is to stand and the elected representatives of the people are to respect its provisions and exercise only the powers therein granted, we must have a Supreme Court to check and restrain the Executive and the Congress from performing acts or passing laws in excess of their powers. Furthermore, the express powers granted to them must be exercised subject to the expressed prohibitions, and they are numerous, found in the Constitution.

It seems to me this conclusion is irresistible. The Supreme Court is necessary to prevent the invasion of rights of the individual and the enforcement of laws adopted by Congress, that the Constitution expressly forbids.

Let us now consider the manner in which the nine judges are to exercise the power of the Court. Shall it be a majority as now, seven of the nine, or unanimous? It is alleged that five men can control the destiny of the country, and that it is too great a power to lodge in so small a number. Hence, it is suggested that the decisions should be unanimous. But this suggestion would permit merely one member of the Court to uphold an act of Congress. Under this plan an act of Congress which, by its terms, takes the property of an individual for public purposes and declares it shall be done without just compensation could be upheld by the vote of one man.

There is only a difference in degree in the suggestions that legislation shall not be determined invalid unless seven of the nine judges vote in the affirmative. This would leave the power in three to do the same thing that the one might do if decisions are required to be unanimous. It would transfer the power of decisions from a majority to a minority of the Court. The power of decision must rest some place. This power was declared in the Court at an early date. While denial of this power has been made from time to time since 1857, the Supreme Court has continuously exercised this power by a majority or more of its members and no effort has been made by the people through a constitutional amendment to curtail that power; nor has Congress, if possessing the power, taken it away from the Court. A larger membership of the Court would still be open to the objection of those who might make it that a majority of the Court should not be entrusted with such great power.

The separation of the three branches of Government, each with powers distinct from those of the other two, was a fundamental principle underlying our Constitution. It is clear that the founders made the legislative branch independent of the executive with power to protect the people against Executive usurpation. In a measure, the Executive was given the power of veto to check the legislative branch. The Supreme Court was given the reviewing power as to acts of either the legislative or executive branch exceeding their respective constitutional powers, in suits brought by individuals or States to set aside those acts in contravention of their rights. And this power was lodged in the Supreme Court by the people.

The definite separation of the three branches of Government, each possessing powers separate and distinct from the other two, did not find its way into the Constitution by chance, or through subterfuge or secrecy. The founders of our Government knew what they wanted and exactly what they were doing when the Constitution was adopted. It expressed their philosophy of Government and their moral concept of the inalienable rights of mankind. They were duly mindful of the tyranny and oppression experienced by the peoples of the world under other forms of Government. They were determined above everything else that tyranny and dictatorship should not exist in the free country they instituted. If attempted, a judicial review by a limited number of men, sitting as a Court, was provided to protect the people and the States from a despotic central government. Indeed, the founders set up every human device, namely, life tenure, fixed salary, removal from political bias and participation in political contests, and a close scrutiny by the Senate of the ability and personal integrity of every justice before he could assume his exalted office. Furthermore, before entering upon their duties, the Justices must each take a solemn oath before God to support and defend the Constitution and protect the people's rights under it. By law and by custom they are removed, as far as it is humanly possible, from all influence in performing their official acts. They are immune from public clamor and the selfish, greedy, and lobbying influence which it seems impossible to eradicate in their efforts to shape the acts of the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

Differences of opinion between so able and so conscientious a group as the justices of the United States Supreme Court is unavoidable. Unanimity in the reasons of decisions in important cases on the part of the justices of such diverse experience, predilection, and methods of approach is impossible to attain in every case.

In the 147 years of its existence, the Supreme Court, in my opinion, has ever been strong compositely in breadth of view, in freedom from bias, in intellectual capacity, in devotion to the furtherance of the welfare of the people as far as that comes within the province of a court, and in freedom from ambition for political preferment. If we cannot get the answer as to the constitutionality of an act of Congress from the individuals of such a court, we cannot expect to get it at all.

If the Supreme Court proves mistaken in their reading of the highest expression of the public will as embodied in the Constitution and the Constitution itself no longer conforms to the new types of social and industrial legislation which the people desire, then, by the very terms of the Constitution, the people are guaranteed the right to make their desires effective through the solemn process of amendment.

I am not arguing against the right to amend the Constitution or the right to discuss the opinions of the Supreme Court. Those rights are clear, definite, and absolute. Let us not forget, however, that the Constitution may be as effectually destroyed by the amending process as by direct attack. What we must preserve above anything else are the principles that are basic and fundamental—the forms which go to the hearts of our liberties.

Proposed amendments should be openly and fully discussed. In my opinion, before any constitutional amendment is approved three things should appear, namely: (1) That there is a present necessity; (2) that the amendment proposed will remove the existing or threatened evil; (3) that, if adopted, the amendment will not in itself produce a greater evil.

In view of the long, able, and patriotic service of the judicial branch of our Government since its very beginning, we should take no hasty action tending to curtail or prevent the Supreme Court from exercising its present powers and functions. Time has repeatedly justified the past decisions of the Court which have occasionally disappointed certain political or economic interests. Time will reaffirm this viewpoint in the future. Delay, enabling calm and deliberate consideration before taking impetuous action, will furnish the time to prove the justification of the decisions.

Let me remind you of the tremendous injury and stupendous results that might follow the acceptance of proposed changes.

Every right, large or small, that an American citizen enjoys, even the simple right to vote in elections, depends upon the integrity of the Constitution and the integrity of the Constitution depends upon the power of the Supreme Court to protect it against congressional invasions.

History has again and again demonstrated that the inalienable rights that our fathers declared were "God given" could be abrogated by rash decisions of men temporarily swept into power at times of great emotional passion and sudden political upheavals.

More valuable than any economic program, and I do not deny the importance of the maintenance of sound, sane, and equitable economic policies, are the basic human rights that our forefathers enumerated in the Declaration of Independence and read into the Constitution with ample governmental machinery to protect them.

The fathers boldly proclaimed that the violation of inalienable rights justified revolution. Free speech, free press, free religion, trial by jury, habeas corpus, protection against search of homes and seizure of private papers without warrant, free assembly, free ballot, and freedom of petition—these, they declared, were such inherent rights that no government worthy of the name could abridge or deny them. Hence they determined that no Executive or temporary autocratic legislative majority should ever interfere with the exercise and enjoyment of these rights by the people of the United States.

The Supreme Court was established as a barrier against the necessity of revolution if either the executive or the legislative branch attempted to take these rights from the people. This Court is the fortress, the arsenal, the standing army of the American people in the protection and enforcement of the inalienable rights which lovers of liberty in every civilized land poured out their blood and treasure to enjoy.

THE LAW LIBRARY OF CONGRESS—ADDRESS BY JOHN T. VANCE

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on The Law Library of Congress, delivered by Hon. John T. Vance at the joint meeting of the American Association of Law Libraries and the National Association of State Libraries at Denver, Colo., June 26, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a historic fact that from the earliest conception of having at the disposal of Members of Congress a library of reference and of ready access, the Library of Congress was associated with our legislative process. That is, of course, the most logical thing to expect of a library originally planned for the service of Members of Congress, primarily in their capacity of legislators.

When the need was first felt that Congress should have a reference library of its own, a congressional committee was appointed to inquire into the matter and to make a report on a catalog of books necessary for the use of Congress. This report was made to the House of Representatives in 1790, and although tabled and no immediate action was taken, it throws an illuminating light upon what was considered by Congress to be the primary purpose of such a library. The report was submitted by Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, who was the foremost advocate of the establishment of a Congressional Library. The report read in part:

"* * * the committee have confined themselves in great measure to books necessary for the use of the legislative and executive departments and not often to be found in private or circulating libraries. That, nevertheless, without further provision of books on laws and government, to which reference is often necessary, Members of the legislative and other offices of the Government may either be deprived of the use of such books when necessary or be obliged at every session to transport to the seat of the General Government a considerable part of their libraries." * * *

The report then specified what was considered the very essence of the requirements of a library for the use of Congress. It continued:

"The books reported were of the following description, viz, laws of the several States, laws relating to the trade and navigation of the several nations of Europe with whom the United States may have treaties, laws of Ireland and Scotland, laws of Canada, British statutes at large, militia system of Switzerland, the Russian and Frederician codes, sundry authors on the laws of nature and nations, sundry authors on the privileges and duties of diplomatic bodies, a collection of parliamentary books, sundry books on the civil and common law, etc."

Thus at the very center of the idea of a congressional library, at that time, as conceived by those responsible for its founding, was law. Of the Library of Congress, then, it may be truly said that the subject of law is its genesis and original purpose.

When the capital was removed to Washington, a congressional library became necessary, inasmuch as there was no library, either private or public, in the new Federal city. Accordingly, among the first legislative acts, an appropriation of $5,000 for the purchase of books for the use of Congress was made, and a joint committee was appointed to arrange for the purchase of books, and provide a suitable place for them, and for rules and regulations for their use. The historian of the Library of Congress, the late William Dawson Johnston, says that "the chairman of this joint committee, and the only member thereof who has left behind him any trace of a fondness for or an acquaintance with books was Samuel Dexter, a graduate of Harvard, and a lawyer of some eminence."¹

President Jefferson "who was from its inception an ardent friend of the Library", took an active interest in the purchase of books and inquired of Congress how other funds had been expended, which occasioned the appointment of a new committee in the House and Senate. Said committee was constituted to make reports on the organization of the Library. The chairman of the new committee was Senator Nicholson, of Virginia. Of this committee of five, John Randolph, of Virginia, was the most forceful member, and author of the report, as well as author of the phrase that "a good library is a statesman's workshop." He was one of the earliest friends and supporters of the Library, always took pains to secure liberal appropriations for it, had a good deal to do with the selection of its books, and now had prepared a report which, like the report of Representative Gerry, June 23, 1790, is one of the most notable documents relating to the early history of the Library, but unlike the former led to legislative action, and became the basis, after some discussion in the House of Representatives, of the act concerning the Library for the use of both Houses of Congress, approved January 26, 1802."²

Thus, we find that not only was the law the central idea in the founding of the Congressional Library but also the leading statesmen early interested in building it up were lawyers. However, due to the fact that there was no public library in Washington, as well as that the Library before 1814 and much after became a place of relaxation due to the lack of amusements, the Library began to assume a more general character. As our Federal Congress and institutions took on new importance, as the seat of the Government became more and more a center of thought and learning, it was to be expected that the Library of Congress would expand and develop and in time become a national institution. That was also in the mind of those most interested. Even in 1817, the idea was abroad to build a library to house a collection which might become of national proportions. As a national library, it has been necessary to make it representative of every field of knowledge. Also it was inevitable that collections and private libraries would be donated or purchased from time to time, making the Library general in its character. The library of Thomas Jefferson, acquired in 1815 after the first collection of books had been destroyed in the burning of the Capitol was of this general nature, though especially strong in law and political science, as they were the subjects in which Jefferson was most interested.

It is interesting to find that there was considerable expression at this early date in favor of permitting the Supreme Court and the heads of the executive departments to have the use of the Congressional Library, but because of the prevailing thought that large legislative appropriations for the purchase of books should not be made, the use of the Library was not accorded under the original act to others than the President, the Vice President, and Members of Congress. Strange as it may seem, it was not until 1812 that the use of the Library was extended to the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, a favor, says Ben Perley Poore, in his Reminiscences, which Chief Justice Marshall prized very highly. "He liked to wait upon himself, rather than to be served by the Librarian * * *"

As early as 1816 a bill was introduced in the Senate for the establishment of a law library for the particular use of the Supreme Court. An appropriation of $1,000 had been made in 1821 for the purchase of lawbooks for the Library of Congress. They were to comprise the statutes and the reports of the decisions of the courts of law and chancery of the different States with the latest maps of the several States and Territories. Later on, during the years 1826, 1828, and 1830, Charles Wyckliffe, of Kentucky, submitted resolutions in the House of Representatives to the effect that the Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of separating the lawbooks from the other books in the Library of Congress and placing them all under the superintendence of the Supreme Court. His insistence was the occasion of an editorial in the National Journal, which opposed the organization of a law library and attempted to belittle his interest with the following ironical comment:

"Mr. Wyckliffe does not seem to have any peculiar penchant for any other reading than that of law, and one would think his inclination might be amply indulged during the session by the access he has to the fine Law Library of Congress and the facilities which the knowledge of its present keeper is so well calculated to afford * * *. Mr. Wyckliffe has been for some time anxious to remove the law department of the Congressional Library, but his efforts have never been successful. To allay this anxiety, it would perhaps be better to alter the rule for Mr. W.'s special accommodation and allow him to have full range among his favorite volumes during the session of the Supreme Court. Mr. W.'s desire to remove, will, if gratified, be a reform like that produced by the present administration, as it will take away the most valuable part of the Library, and perhaps fill its place with something that is less so."³

In 1829 a resolution in the House of Representatives was tabled which sought to have the Library Committee inquire into the expediency of providing more effectual means of obtaining copies of the laws of the several States as they were annually enacted. A quotation from the report on this resolution is of interest, since it points very directly to a need which was felt even at that time. The report began: "The importance of having within reach of the Members of Congress copies of the laws of the several States need not be enforced." The report continued:

"The committee consider it as very desirable that a prompt and regular supply of the laws of the several States should be made to the Public Library (the Library of Congress). Some of the reasons which exist for furnishing the acts of the National Legislature to the several States make it desirable that those of the several States should be accessible at the seat of the General Government; and these reasons, no doubt, led to the adoption at a very early period, of the resolution which made it the duty of the Secretary of State to procure the laws of the several States."

Edward Everett, who reported this resolution to the House, had a few years earlier written to Mr. Justice Story, of the United States Supreme Court, regarding the importance of the law collection in the Library, to which Judge Story replied: "I entirely agree with you respecting the civil-law books to be placed in the Congress Library. It would be a sad dishonor of a national library not to contain the works of Cujacius, Vinnius, Heineccius, Brissonius, Voet, etc. They are often useful for reference, and sometimes indispensable for a common lawyer. How could one be sure of some nice doctrines in the civil law of Louisiana without possessing and consulting them? What is to become of the laws of Florida without them?"

However, Mr. Wyckliffe's efforts were finally rewarded and on the 14th of December 1831, on the motion of Senator Grundy, the Senate "Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a law library for the use of the Supreme Court of the United States." This was followed in January by a bill from the same committee, entitled "An act to increase and improve the law department of the Library of Congress." This act, which forms the charter of the Law Library of Congress, was approved on the 14th of July 1832.³

Thus, a most important department of the Library, destined to take on added importance as the years went by, was at last officially recognized. The act, after instructing as to the location of the new department and the removal of the law books, further enacted:

"That the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall have free access to the said Law Library; and they are hereby authorized and empowered to make such rules and regulations for the use of the same, by themselves and the attorneys and counselors, during the sittings of the said Court, as they shall deem proper: Provided, Such rules and regulations shall not restrict the President of the United States, the Vice President, or any Member of the Senate or House of Representatives, from having access to the said Library, or using the books therein, in the same manner that he now has, or may have, to use the books of the Library of Congress."

The law further defined that the Law Library was a part of the Library of Congress and subject to the same regulations, its incidental expenses to be paid out of the appropriations of the Library of Congress. It then appropriated a sum not exceeding $5,000 and an annual sum of $1,000 for 5 years for the purchase of lawbooks under direction of the Chief Justice of the United States.

The new law library was located in the Capitol, occupying until 1843, a room north of the main Library. It was then removed to the west side of the basement in the north wing of the Capitol, near the Supreme Court, and in 1860, was removed to the old room of the Supreme Court on the east side, which had served for more than 50 years as the chambers of the court of final appeal. When this law was passed, the law collection consisted of 2,011 volumes, about 640 of which were in the Jefferson collection. Today the Law Library contains around 325,000 volumes, exclusive of countless lawbooks scattered throughout the general Library in the related fields of social sciences, as well as in special collections. Forty thousand of these are located in the old Supreme Court in the Capitol, where they have been placed for the exclusive use of the bar of the Supreme Court and Members of Congress.

Across from the old Supreme Court chamber is located the conference library of the Supreme Court, consisting of 20,000 volumes for the exclusive use of the Court. At the present time these are being moved to the new Supreme Court Building, and the Law Library is provided also from its duplicate collections, both in the Main Library Building and from the Capitol, about 30,000 volumes. These two collections, together with the Elbridge Gerry law library, donated to the Court by Senator Peter G. Gerry, of Rhode Island, numbering about 30,000 volumes, will provide two adequate working law libraries for the bar and the Court in the new temple of justice.

In addition to the various collections just named which are a part of the Law Library of Congress, a small reference collection is maintained just off the floor of the House of Representatives. This law material in this collection, as well as that located in the House of Representatives library, is also a part of the Law Library of Congress. Then, there are approximately 6,000 volumes which are known as "judges' sets", and which are distributed as required at the residences of the justices of the Supreme Court for their individual use.

It will no doubt be of interest to law librarians to hear how all of these various collections are administered.

By the act of 1832, supra, the law library was placed under the Librarian of Congress, made a part thereof, and subject to the same regulations, except that the Justices of the Supreme Court were authorized to make such rules and regulations for the use of the Law Library, by themselves, and the attorneys and counselors, during the sittings of said Court, as they should deem proper. It also provided that such rules and regulations should not restrict the President of the United States, the Vice President, or any Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives from having access to the said law library in the same manner that he then had or might have, to use the books in the Library of Congress. It was further provided that the Librarian should make the purchases of the books for the law library, under such directions and pursuant to such catalogs as should be furnished him by the Chief Justice of the United States. All of these provisions have been continued and written into the permanent statutes concerning the administration of the law library.⁴ There is one other exception in the administration of the law library, namely, it is provided specifically by law that the law library shall be kept open as long as Congress is in session, so that if one of the Senators should filibuster and keep the Senate in session all night, the law library has to remain open for the service of that august body. This very thing happened within the past 2 weeks, and one of my able assistants remained on the job for the entire night after he had reported for work at 2:30 in the afternoon.

Under the law, the Librarian of Congress appoints all of the employees of the Library "solely with reference to their fitness for the position."⁵ Thus, the Law Librarian and the entire staff of the Law Library, which, incidentally, is very small compared to other large law libraries, are appointed by the Librarian. The total personnel of the Law Library staff numbers 17, 4 of whom have been assigned to administer the law collection in the Capitol for the use of Congress and the Supreme Court. The administrative headquarters of the various collections are located in the main building, where the larger part of the Law Library is located. The administrative work there consists largely in keeping up with the current literature of the law and preparing recommendations for purchase; maintaining the catalogs—union, subject, and shelf list; reference work of a great variety, and superintending the cataloging. Manifestly, with such a limited number of employees, the cataloging could not be done by the law staff. However, this is supervised by the chief assistant, while the actual cataloging is done in the catalog division of the Library by 10 employees, some of whom give all their time to cataloging and others merely part time. The purchasing is also done by the general Library, but the searching is all done by the Law Library staff, and merely the ordering and payment of bills are done by the accessions division and the disbursing division, respectively, of the general Library.

The superintendent of the reading room of the general Library administers the circulation of the law books from the main building, just as he does all other material in the Library, but, the circulation from the law collection at the Capitol is attended to by the staff of the Law Library.

From the foregoing it would seem that the small number of employees, namely, 17, is not a true picture, since considerable help is given by various divisions of the general Library, but I can assure you that the red tape consumed in working through other divisions as a part of the general Library more than balances the services rendered, and with an additional 8 or 10 employees, the Law Library could more effectively administer its own establishment. The only advantage I can see in being a part of the general Library is the proximity to the great general reference collections.

The conference library has always been administered by the Supreme Court and all of the books have been supplied by the Library of Congress. The status quo will be continued when the Supreme Court enters its new building in the fall, the Congress having provided a staff of five assistants for the Supreme Court librarian under the United States marshal. The Library of the House of Representatives is administered by the Library of Congress, but the employees are appointed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Thus, we find a hodgepodge of library administration, perhaps without parallel throughout the library world, and yet, while it may not fulfill modern standards of efficiency, as far as the service to Congress, the Supreme Court, the executive departments, and even to the general public, goes, it seems to your humble servant that it is remarkably well done.

Of the various collections in the many fields of law and jurisprudence now in the Law Library, it would, of course, be impossible to give more than a most cursory description in the time at my disposal. Not a year passes but notable and important acquisitions are made, some by gift, or exchange, the most by purchase—in American colonial law, of which we are trying to organize a comprehensive and as complete a collection as possible; in early English, Latin American, in foreign, in general; in Roman law, canon law, and other works important in the history and science of jurisprudence.

Examination of the shelves early in the present century showed the Library to be weak in Roman, civil, and canon law, in the law of nations and in comparative jurisprudence. There were also few works in public and administrative law. The Law Library, under great difficulties and handicapped by insufficient funds, set out to remedy and fill in these deficiencies. There were at the turn of the century about 100,000 volumes in the Law Library. Today there are 325,000 volumes. From 1901-30 the library had to carry on with an appropriation of $3,000 a year, supplemented by small assignments from the appropriations for the general Library. Only in 1930 when the Library had grown to 240,000 volumes was anything like a proper, but yet inadequate, annual sum of $50,000 made available.

The Law Library possesses unquestionably a notable collection of early Americana in colonial legislation and early laws of the States. The most notable purchases in this field have been colonial session laws. Material of this type seldom comes on the market, and with the inadequate appropriation of $3,000 from 1900-30 very little could be acquired, but by keeping careful watch on catalogs and with the advantage of being at the seat of the Federal Government the Law Library has been able to fill many of the gaps in these collections. Among some of the rare imprints owned by the Law Library of Congress are the Georgia Laws, 1755-70, printed by James Johnson; the Code Noir of Louisiana, printed at New Orleans in 1787; the 1816 Cass Code of Michigan; the Bradford New Jersey Laws of 1717; the New York Laws of 1694 and 1710; the Deseret Constitution of 1849; etc.

Among the various collections which have come to the Law Library or in which it has been a participant is the Jefferson collection, from which came 639 books in the field of law, forming the nucleus of the future Law Library. Congress in 1866 appropriated $5,000 for the purchase of the law collection of James Louis Petigru, of the Department of Justice. In 1882 Dr. Joseph Meredith Toner donated to the Library of Congress a library of 27,000 volumes and 12,000 pamphlets and periodicals. Of these, some 1,300 volumes came to the Law Library. From the Von Maurer library 500 volumes of French and German legal periodicals were received in 1903. One of the most valuable bequests came from the collection of incunabula of John Boyd Thacher, deposited in the Library, supplying valuable material in the field of Roman law. The most important single collection, however, in the domain of Roman jurisprudence came from the library of Prof. Paul Kruger, of the University of Bonn, which was acquired in 1930. It consists of some 4,700 volumes, practically all of which are legal works—391 periodical volumes, 800 bound volumes, 500 unbound volumes, and 3,000 monographs. When it is remembered that Professor Kruger was the collaborator with that great authority on Roman law, Theodor Mommsen, in editing the Corpus Juris Civilis, the name, as you know, given to the famous Justinian Code, the value of this collection is evident.

Another very important accession to the Law Library in 1929 was 300 legal titles from the collection of Dr. Otto Vollbehr, of Berlin. These brought the number of incunabula in the Law Library to 450 titles. Since 1923 about 650 volumes from the famous libraries of the Emperors of All the Russias have been acquired. They deal with military laws, laws concerning the abolition of serfdom in the reign of Alexander II, laws of Nicholas II, and revisions of civil and criminal laws. They include the first two books printed in Russia in 1649 and 1650—these are the Code of Laws of Czar Alexis Mikhailovich and Kormchaia Kniga or Pilot Book containing the ecclesiastical and civil laws made at Byzantium about the ninth century.

We are gradually adding to another important domain of law, namely, that of canon law. Among our recent acquisitions are an early edition (1571) of the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent, and more important the Decretals of Pope Gregory IX, the first official compilation of canon law, begun in 1230 and completed in 1234. Our edition is of 1586. I might mention here that in return for the services of the Library of Congress in assisting a few years ago in the cataloging of the Vatican Library, several valuable works on canon law were presented to the Law Library by the Vatican, including the Acts and Decrees of the Vatican Council of 1870; the acts of the pontificate of Leo XIII, 1881-1905, consisting of 23 volumes; acts of the pontificate of Pius IX, 1854-1878; comprised in some seven volumes. In January 1930 Pope Pius XI made a gift to the Library of Congress of reproductions of 15 of the earliest papal charters. In 1933 we received from the present Apostolic Delegate to the United States a 12-volume set of the Codificazione Canonica Orientale.

One of the most valued collections in the Law Library is that of the English Year Books, or law reports, prior to the seventeenth century. For these we have been largely indebted to Judge William Vail Kellen, of Boston, who has been contributing these invaluable documents since the library purchased his collection in 1904. We have now the second largest collection of these year-books in this country, possessing some 320 volumes, covering the period from Edward I to Henry VIII. The practical value of this collection, which I will refer to later, has been cited by Mr. Justice Stone in deciding a case before the Supreme Court. The crowning jewel of the early English collection is the 1482 first edition of Littleton's Tenures, one of three copies listed by Professor Beale. The Law Library also has the rare second edition, printed by Machlinia, circa 1483. Another noteworthy acquisition, adding 247 volumes of English treatises, as well as several Maryland colonial session laws, is the library of Justice Samuel Chase, of the United States Supreme Court, received from the Peabody Library, of Georgetown, D. C., in 1930.

In 1923 an effort was begun to extend and fill in our Latin American collections, which were deficient particularly in the laws of Mexico and Brazil. It was my privilege to be sent to Mexico that year to seek to fill in these needs. As a result, the Law Library acquired about 2,500 volumes of legal material comprising nearly every official publication of a legal nature (except the official gazettes) of 11 states and a large number of codes, constitutions, and session laws of the remaining 17. I may mention that back in 1854 Congress appropriated $1,700 for the purchase of Spanish and Mexican lawbooks.

As I have said, it would be impossible to mention all our important acquisitions and collections in the time at my disposal. A separate paper could be devoted to their enumeration and description. I have mentioned but a few of the more interesting works and collections on our shelves. I may add that the Law Library has now a fairly complete collection of the briefs and records of the United States Supreme Court, which have been filled in around the purchase by Congress in 1883 of a set of these records from the estate of Matthew H. Carpenter. In 1924 there was donated to the library 862 volumes from the library of Chief Justice Fuller, covering the records and briefs of the court during his presence on that tribunal from 1888 to 1910.

Another of our great Supreme Court Judges, Mr. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who recently passed away and whose name as a lawyer, statesman, and soldier will be indelibly marked upon our history, has bequeathed to the Library of Congress his library of some 13,000 volumes, 3,000 or more of which are in the field of law, jurisprudence, and the philosophy of law, and these will henceforth grace the shelves of the Law Library.

Today the Library of Congress of the United States stands out as one of the world's greatest collections of books. Surely, the Law Library of Congress has the right to aspire to stand out pre-eminently in its own field and to become, if not one of the world's great repositories of legal knowledge and record, at least, the outstanding center of legal record and reference in the United States. Mr. Justice Stone, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, speaking before the Appropriations Subcommittee of the House of Representatives in 1933, said:

"I am thinking not so much of the needs of the Court, which, of course, are important, but of the proper place of a law library established by the Nation as part of its chief Library. In the long run, such a Law Library is of use, of course, to the Court, to the great departments of the Government, and the Congress, as well as to the various official bodies which come to Washington from time to time in one capacity or another.

"But I am looking at it a little more comprehensively even than that. This Nation should have a law library to which official bodies and individuals would come, from every part of this country and from abroad, for the purpose of conducting legal investigation and research. But it will not be limited wholly even to that use, because the historian, the student of the social and economic life of the Nation, will ultimately find in the Law Library the material which is the subject of his investigations."

In other words, Mr. Justice Stone believes that it is not merely a question of a reference library for the Supreme Court or merely for the use of the Members of Congress and of Government departments, but a law library for the Nation as a whole—namely, a national law library. Not only that, but it should stand out as a center of legal research for students and jurists in other lands.

It is indeed a strange thing to say in this day and age, when our legal system has reached such proportions and complexity, that since establishing the Law Library as a separate department of the Library of Congress in 1832, neither Congress nor the Court has taken little more than a passing interest in its growth and needs. I believe one of the reasons for that state of affairs has been that its interests were lost sight of in the expansion and varied interests of the Library of Congress as a whole. Had the Law Library been made a separate institution in 1832 instead of merely a department of the Library of Congress, I feel that we might have now a different story to tell. I feel that we would today have one of the finest law libraries in the world. And Congress would have been more interested. More adequate appropriations would have been available.

As things stand there is constant confusion and misunderstanding even as to the identity of the Law Library. Let me give you an example. In 1932 an already reduced appropriation of $40,000, not a very great sum, was asked for the Law Library. One of the Senators moved to cut down that appropriation to $25,000 in the belief that the Law Library merely consisted of the Supreme Court library in the Capitol, which bears out what I have said as to the lack of proper interest on the part of Congress. Fortunately, that serious misunderstanding has since been corrected, and an annual appropriation of $50,000 has been restored to the Law Library. Senator David Reed, in moving the amendment, declared that the appropriation ought to be at the very least $75,000, and that even that sum would be inadequate, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge. It has only been since 1930, however, nearly 100 years after the establishment of the Law Library, and when a distinguished member of our Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Stone, together with prominent representatives of the bench and bar, first appeared before the House Appropriations Committee, that anything like an adequate sum has been made available.

There is another reason why the Law Library has become an institution of national importance. Within the last 20 years the powers and activities of the Federal Government have grown and extended more than in the previous hundred years. Since the present administration took office new authority has been given to the Central Government and new functions added. This creates an entirely new situation in our constitutional and legal history. Further, the United States long ago reached a position of importance in international affairs. This extension of authority and range of activity is clearly reflected in the demands made on the Law Library.

Speaking before the House Appropriations Committee in 1930, Mr. Justice Stone cited several instances to show how very necessary it is to have in the Law Library and at the service of the Supreme Court or other branches of the judiciary some rare tome, perhaps of the Middle Ages, reference to which may decide the issue in an important case. Such early imprints are only discovered and acquired by systematic, informed research. It is not true to say generally that they are picked up by accident. Rather it is proper to say they are acquired by fortuitous circumstance, of which we can more readily avail ourselves when properly equipped and financed for that purpose. One of the cases cited by Mr. Justice Stone is of special interest. The case turned on a plea of nolle contendere. "Of course", said Justice Stone, "that turned on what the plea of nolle contendere was as we took it over from the English law. One circuit court of appeals had held that it meant one thing, and another circuit court of appeals had held that it meant another. In fact, the point was this: One circuit court of appeals had held that on that plea a prison sentence could not be imposed; another court had held that it could, and, of course, the case came to us because of the conflict. The determination of the question ultimately turned on the translation of a case in the yearbooks in the time of Henry VII. Now, that material I found here in the Congressional Library (that is, Law Library), but there are only a few libraries in the country where you could find it."¹⁰

Another case involved the interpretation of a treaty with Denmark, to arrive at a judgment of which it was necessary to examine a large number of works on medieval French law. Many of these works were very old and very rare, but as the Justice relates, most of them were found in the Law Library.

In 1933, Mr. James Oliver Murdock, chairman of the American Bar Association committee on the facilities of the law library, speaking before a similar House committee, said:

"It is most essential that the Congress which makes the national laws be provided with a law library second to none. When legislation is proposed in Congress the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress should have readily at their disposal the legislative and the court experience of the past. Social problems are recurrent. If proposed legislation can be projected against similar legislative experience of the past, grave mistakes may be avoided. The advantage gained by such a procedure may in a single instance far exceed the total cost of the Law Library of Congress to date. We are living in a time of great economic and social readjustments. If changes in our national laws are made in the light of the legislative experience of the United States and of other countries, the people of the United States may rest assured that mistakes of the past will not be repeated."¹¹

I could quote many more instances and opinions of distinguished jurists and active busy lawyers to show how important is the service which we should be able to render the Nation through a well-equipped national law library. It is not merely a matter of sentiment or of prestige. It is a question of a most necessary and insistent demand from our courts, from the legal profession, from the public, and from our Government in its legislative and administrative branches. But despite this handicap the service rendered is almost immeasurable. I have given one or two instances. The Law Library of Congress has perhaps the greatest variety of demands made upon it of any similar library in the world. It is used by the Supreme Court of the United States, the inferior tribunals of the city of Washington, the Congress, the executive departments, bureaus, and commissions. The diplomatic corps have the legal right to use it and they exercise that right extensively. Hundreds of inquiries come in from private individuals all over the country as well as from members of the bar. In addition there is a tremendous research going on in the fields of sociology and economics related to law. The Law Library of Congress has become thus a great center of research in law and related sciences of which there is probably no parallel in any other country.

It is the knowledge of this increasing demand and the difficulties we are laboring under to meet it, that has brought together representatives of the bench and bar in an organization, recently formed, called the Friends of the Law Library of Congress. The organization is composed not only of judges and lawyers but of political scientists, sociologists, bibliophiles, and others interested in its purposes. These purposes are:

1. To stimulate interest in the Law Library of Congress among American lawyers throughout the world and others interested in the law, in order that it may become the Nation's chief repository of legal sources and center of juridical research.
2. To promote the acquisition by the Law Library of printed books, pamphlets, and manuscripts, and other source material in the field of law, through direct donation thereof and through gifts and bequests for these purposes.
3. To foster, under the auspices of our national law library, legal research and other activities devoted to the collection, dissemination, and better knowledge of the literature and history of jurisprudence.
4. To cooperate in the obtainment of all necessary facilities, to carry out the aforementioned purposes, and to consider means whereby the Law Library may render greater service to the Nation.

It is the objective of the friends of the Law Library to bring home to those in the fields of law, jurisprudence, and related sciences as well as to our legislators in Congress, the fact that this program can no longer be postponed. There is in Washington a famous library, the Surgeon General's Library, as it is popularly called. It consists of more than 1,000,000 medical works, built up through the years with the cooperation of our Government and an understanding as to its value in research and education. It has also the appreciation and support of the medical profession. If that appreciation has become so articulate and such an end has been achieved in the field of medical science, there is no reason why a great national law library, intimately related to the science and process of government, may not be built up. I appeal to the members of the American Association of Law Libraries, both individually and as a representative organization, fully appreciative of this great work, to interest themselves in the purpose of the friends of the Law Library of Congress. They may thus participate in making the Law Library the most outstanding source of legal knowledge and research in the world and assist in building a monument worthy of our country and its place in the development of jurisprudence—a great collection of legal knowledge and record which, in the words of Mr. Justice Stone, "will be of service to men interested in the law, and to scholars, for all time."

SIX MARTYRED SENATORS—ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the March issue of the magazine Real America, entitled "Six Martyred Senators."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Real America for March 1936]

SIX MARTYRED SENATORS PLAYED BY WAR MAKERS' GREED By Richard L. Neuberger

[As Europe rushes madly toward another war, and the United States is once more bombarded with insidious propaganda from foreign countries, international bankers, professional patriots, and war mongers, we will do well to remember the six Senators who in 1917 dared defy the propaganda-inspired war hysteria. Six men who retained a true perspective, six men who were branded as traitors, six men who are slowly being recognized as among the greatest of American patriots. Perhaps their courageous stand 19 years ago will help America remain sane in the years to come.—Editor.]

Dusk was settling on Capitol Hill. In the April evening the trees along Pennsylvania Avenue cast long and grotesque shadows. Flags, swaying from every edifice, lost their color in the gathering dark. Little clusters of men stood nervously on street corners looking up anxiously at the wall-like sides of the Government buildings.

In an office near the front of the Senate Office Building it was somber and still. The lights had not been switched on and the pompous-crested head of the junior Senator from Oregon was only an outline in the gloom. The senior Senator watched him worriedly. Finally he broke the silence, "War is certain to be declared. A vote against it means your political ruin. Your one vote cannot possibly make any difference. Don't forget we are fighting to make the world safe for democracy."

The junior Senator's expression was invisible in the darkness, so his colleague did not see the grim smile on his lips as he replied, "I cannot vote tomorrow to throw our country into a struggle, the final results of which no one is able to foretell. This is not a war to make the world safe for democracy. It is a war to make the world safe for greed and profits. After this war there will be less democracy than ever before."

"But it means ruin for you, sorrow for your family."

"War means sorrow for millions of families. I cannot vote 'yes' on the war resolution."

The senior Senator shrugged hopelessly. Through the heavily curtained window behind the junior Senator he could see the vast bulk of the Capitol dome, massive and strong in the glow of the spring evening.

Almost 3,000 miles from Washington, against the black of the night sky, a blazing dummy on a telephone pole flickered in the wind like a huge torch. On the lawn below, the mob brandished clubs and stones and gesticulated angrily. Hoarse threats and imprecations came to the ears of the white-faced people in the home across the street.

The junior Senator had voted that day against America's entrance into the World War, and the wrathful crowd was burning him in effigy. Wasn't the Senator a traitor? Hadn't the newspapers classed him with Benedict Arnold? Didn't even the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show he had made a lot of treasonable talk about financial and commercial interests driving the country into war? No chicken-hearted Hun lover is going to represent our State! From the nearby house members of the Senator's family watched in terror.

That same night in America five other sacks of straw blazed in the night wind, the roar of the flames mingling ominously with the shouts of infuriated mobs. Oregon was not the only State with a "traitor" in the Senate. In the words of the press, Missouri, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Mississippi also "stood disgraced in the eyes of the Nation." Each of these Commonwealths had sent to Washington a Senator who opposed until the end the plunge into the vortex of blood and thunder across the Atlantic: Senator Asle J. Gronna, of North Dakota; Senator Harry Lane, of Oregon; Senator Robert M. La Follette, Sr., of Wisconsin; Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska; Senator William J. Stone, of Missouri; Senator James K. Vardaman, of Mississippi.

Upon these men descended an avalanche of abuse and derision without parallel in the history of their country. They endured what Senator BONE, of Washington, a member of the Nye Munitions Investigation Committee, recently termed an "outright intellectual lynching." They became objects of scorn throughout the land. Their names were regarded as synonymous with "treason."

Three were Democrats—Stone, Vardaman, and Lane—and the others were Republicans, but they were vilified and castigated by both parties alike. The heavy artillery of virtually every publication in the land fired a continual barrage of epithets and anathema at this "little group of willful men."

Their friends beseeched them not to adopt the position they did. Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, later told how he had begged his colleague, Senator Stone, to refrain from voting against the war resolution, and how the latter had proudly replied:

"I know the people are aflame with the spirit of battle, but would you have me consider my personal welfare in a case that involves the heartaches of countless mothers?"

First of the tiny minority to give up his life for his convictions was Senator Lane. In the debate over the issue of war he had pleaded for neutrality. Condemned by the preponderant majority of the Senate, he had flayed the producers of armaments for fomenting strife and hatred, and had militantly declared:

"If we have citizens who want to go around over the world during wartimes selling munitions, I do not wish to take care of them. I would vote to put up a lot of big signs warning them to stay at home."

The words of the Oregon Senator today are regarded as epitomizing the crux of the celebrated neutrality resolution, adopted by the Seventy-fourth Congress, signed by President Roosevelt, and heralded in a score of nations as a mandate for peace. In 1917 Senator Lane's remarks brought him no applause—only death. He was the lone Senator from west of the Rockies to side with the dissenters, and the entire Pacific coast joined in pillorying him as a twentieth century Benedict Arnold. His closest friends turned on him in scorn. His mail brought threats of physical violence.

So terribly did the abuse and condemnation affect Senator Lane that he knew he was going to die. Shortly after the passage of the declaration of war he left the Capital for his home in the West. He told his two closest friends, Norris and La Follette, he never would see them again—and he never did. Senator Lane died in San Francisco, en route to Oregon. On the floor of the Senate La Follette bitterly accused the war-mongers and professional patriots of having murdered Lane, and called him the first martyr of the war.

Less than a year later Senator Stone was buried at Nevada, Mo., another victim of hatred and hysteria. As a ranking Democrat, Stone was chairman of the powerful Foreign Relations Committee, but this did not spare him the shafts of his own party. The Literary Digest thus summarized his position:

"The retention of the Missouri Senator as head of the Foreign Relations Committee is roundly denounced by Democratic editors as a 'scandal' and 'an offense to the country.'"

The Washington Herald unctiously editorialized:

"His monumental blunder will be forgotten in the future by an indulgent nation."

Eighteen years after Senator Stone's "monumental blunder", Senator GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota, chairman of the special committee investigating the causes of America's participation in the war, rose on the floor of the Senate—across the aisle from where Senator Stone once sat—and declared:

"There is altogether too much truth in the assertion that war and preparedness for war are nothing more than games, games for profit. . . . I think civilization owes a debt of gratitude to men who in that day dared to speak their minds upon an issue when it was a whole lot less popular than it is today."

With the exception of Senator NORRIS, it is too late for the dissenters to collect the "debt" their country owes. Only the silver-haired Nebraska Senator survives to appear before the tribunal of public opinion and hear the verdict changed. A burst of pride came to him as he addressed his colleagues shortly after the overwhelming passage of the Nye-Clark neutrality resolution:

"I was here during the World War. I was in this body when we declared war. I am now the only living man who was then a Member of the Senate, who was present in the Senate when the vote was cast and who voted against that declaration. . . . Of all the votes I ever cast in this body or in the House of Representatives during my 10 years of service in that body, I never cast one with which I was so well satisfied as I was and am with my vote against that declaration of war."

Each of the six dissenters contended that propaganda circulated by those able to reap profits from America's participation on the side of the Allies was largely responsible for driving the United States into the war.

Among the Senators who bristlingly answered their charges was Warren G. Harding, of Ohio, "I am not voting for war in response to the campaign of the munitions makers, for there has been none. . . . I am voting for war in the name of democracy."

Senator Claude Swanson, of Virginia, declared, "In waging this war we will be aiding the free, liberal, and democratic nations to overthrow in Germany the last refuge of autocracy and militarism." As Secretary of the Navy, Swanson now is demanding bigger and better battleships to protect our shores from the possible depredations of the autocrats ruling Japan, one of the "free, liberal, and democratic nations."

In the closing hours of the debate on the war resolution, while debutantes and their escorts from the military ball watched in the galleries, it was NORRIS and La Follette who most angered the majority. The Nebraska Senator contended America was entering the holocaust across the Atlantic upon the command of gold:

"We are going to run the risk of sacrificing millions of our countrymen's lives so that other countrymen may coin their life-blood into money. . . . All because we want to preserve the commercial right of American citizens to deliver munitions of war to the belligerent nations. . . . I feel that we are about to put a dollar stamp on the American flag. . . . Upon the passage of this resolution we will have joined Europe in the great catastrophe and taken America into entanglements that will not end with this war, but will live and bring their evil influences upon many generations yet unborn."

This brought Senator Reed, of Missouri, bouncing to the floor in indignation: "The war is not being waged over dollars. . . . It is not being waged over commerce. It is not being waged over profits and losses." He then charged NORRIS with having bordered on treason.

A hush fell on the Chamber as the Nebraskan placidly replied: "The Senator from Missouri has said something that at some time he will regret, I believe."

Reed later heard Woodrow Wilson himself state: "This war . . . was a commercial and industrial war." In 1925 Reed described the stand of the six dissenting Senators against American participation as "the most superb act of courage this century has witnessed."

NORRIS' contentions also found no favor with the Outlook, which thus described "The Disloyal Senators": "They have humiliated us before the world. They should never again be intrusted by the American people with public office." This same issue carried a photograph of an armless French soldier and told how splendidly he would get along with the artificial limbs then being manufactured for him. There also was an editorial praising that great orator and patriot, the Reverend William H. (Billy) Sunday.

La Follette made the principal address for the minority. He said that "wealth has never yet sacrificed itself on the altar of patriotism in any war." He struck the very keynote of the current neutrality measures when he proclaimed his dissent in these terms, "I say this, that the comparatively small privilege of the right of an American citizen to ride on a munition-loaded ship, flying a foreign flag, is too small to involve this Government in the loss of millions of lives. . . ."

Over La Follette flowed a raging torrent of abuse and calumny. Stated the North American Review, "Wisconsin is the Badger State and was beguiled into sending to the Senate a two-legged specimen of the most detested species of the badger family." Charles Edward Russell was quoted as being equally delightful, "La Follette is simply a big yellow streak." Thundered Theodore Roosevelt, Sr., "La Follette is a sinister enemy of democracy. I wish we could make him a gift to the Kaiser for use in his Reichstag."

A flood of resolutions demanded the denunciation, and even the expulsion, of the Senators who had voted against the war resolution. Several public groups in Oregon requested that Senator Lane be banished to another country. La Follette was condemned by the legislature of his State, the lower house voting in favor of such action 53 to 32, and the senate 26 to 4. In the same room where the upper chamber took this step Senator NYE last year declared, "It is you whom we honor today . . . who was called un-American, disloyal, trouble-maker, underminer of democracy, pro-German, fool, knave, publicity hunter, liar, deceiver, for having dared to speak the truth that one and all can know today to have been the truth."

Tremendous national interest centered on the dissenters. Although an overwhelming majority of the Senate favored the declaration of war, much of the New York Times was devoted to the disagreeing half dozen:

"La Follette scourged by Williams as pro-German and anti-American—'Treason' cry at NORRIS—Nebraska Senator denounced for hinting that commercialism prompted Nation's course—Opponents 'willful men'—Three from each party—La Follette, in 4-hour speech, assailed Great Britain."

In 1917 a United States Senator was vilified and castigated for "hinting" that greed propelled his country into war. In 1935 the Nye committee released to the press of the Nation copies of the famous cable from Ambassador Page in London, which Wilson received at almost the same time he branded the dissenters as "willful men." Dated March 5, 1917, the message stated:

"The pressure of this approaching crisis, I am certain, has gone beyond the ability of the Morgan financial agency for the British and French Governments. . . . It is not improbable that the only way of maintaining our present preeminent trade position and averting a panic is by declaring war on Germany. . . ."

Apparently the editorial writer on the New York Herald was as unaware of the existence of the Page cable as the rest of his countrymen when he thus made short shrift of the dissenters:

"They will be fortunate if their names do not go down into history bracketed with that of Benedict Arnold."

Inspired by the filibuster against Wilson's armed-ship bill and by the opposition to the war resolution, these and similarly titled editorials appeared:

"Action Approaches Treason." (Portland (Me.) Press.)

"Imitators of Benedict Arnold." (Philadelphia Record.)

"The Senate Roll of Dishonor." (Richmond Times-Dispatch.)

"The Nation Has Been Disgraced." (Wheeling Register.)

The attempts to humiliate and embarrass the six men who had voted "no" took almost unbelievable forms. In hundreds of communities they were burned in effigy. Any political opportunist seeking publicity or any salesman after free advertising for his product could jump into the public print if he would vilify Gronna, Norris, Vardaman, Lane, Stone, or La Follette. Such epithets as "copperheads" and "skunks" were typical. A Roman holiday was held throughout the land at their expense. They were cartooned in German uniforms. Iron crosses were sent them through the mail. Speaking engagements were abruptly canceled, and they were given no explanation. School children were taught that the six dissenting Senators represented the nadir of shame and despair.

Under this withering fire the half dozen old men reacted differently in all save one respect: They refused to yield their conviction that entrance into the war was a folly and crime. La Follette, gathered with a few friends in the basement of the Capitol, said, "The children may live to see the day when sentiment will change toward me. * * * I never shall." Lane's health failed rapidly. His face sagged; he became almost unrecognizable. Going about the Senate, he would have to be supported by Norris or La Follette. Near the end of his days in Washington, a blood vessel burst in his head and he could scarcely see. Norris went home to Nebraska and risked being lynched to tell a vast crowd why he had taken a position against the war resolution. He had the courage to resign from the Senate and stand for reelection on his record.

Each of the six men suffered abuse until his death—with the solitary exception of Norris, who has lived to see his stand vindicated. Vardaman, surviving until 1930, witnessed the start of the change in sentiment, but for years the names of the dissenting half dozen were on the — of a — list of innumerable publications. Lane and Stone died before the war was ended; Gronna passed on in 1922, and La Follette was stricken in the summer of 1925, a year after his unsuccessful campaign for the Presidency, during which his war record was continually branded as "treasonable."

There is no more forceful object lesson against war hysteria than the story of the Senators (although not present at the time of the vote, Senator THOMAS P. GORE, of Oklahoma, was reported as being opposed to the declaration of war) who braved a hurricane of contumely to vote against America's leap into the maelstrom on the other side of the Atlantic. Seventeen years after the final volley of the "war to make the world safe for democracy" and "the war to end war", despots on two continents again march toward Armageddon. This reawakening of the martial spirit abroad has prompted America to attempt to compensate for the terrific hatred it vented on six old men in 1917.

Last year memorial services were held at the graves of the dissenting Senators who have died. La Follette's two sons are Governor and senior United States Senator from Wisconsin. One of Gronna's sons is North Dakota's secretary of state, the other a district judge and former State's attorney general. Citizens in Oregon are planning erection of a statue to Senator Lane. A memorial recently was unveiled at Nevada, Mo., in tribute to Senator Stone. Speaking at the dedication of the Stone monument, Senator BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, member of the Nye Munitions Committee, declared:

"Well we had our war. * * * The whole world has been passing through the fiery aftermath of that war. Brutal dictatorships are in the ascendant in nearly every land as a result of the war to make the world safe for democracy. * * * And across the years I still see the figure of that man looking out to the light, willing to sacrifice his own political life in a protest against these things coming into being."

LISTENING TO MR. B—ARTICLE BY F. W. HART

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an article by Mr. F. W. Hart, which appeared in the February 1936 number of the magazine known as the Social Frontier. I have received this article from a member of the National Educational Association, and in the letter transmitting it the writer says:

The attached article in the Social Frontier for February describes one of the most insidious instruments of Wall Street propaganda in the Nation.

After a careful reading of the article I agree with the opinion expressed by the writer who has sent this article to me. I have changed the text of the article by striking out the name of the individual who was supposed to be the speaker at the banquet referred to, substituting a simple letter, because I do not care to identify anyone with the activities described here. The article is entitled "Listening to Mr. B." I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Social Frontier for February 1936]

LISTENING TO MR. B

Some 300 schoolmen—old and young—teachers, supervisors, principals, and superintendents, are gathered for their annual banquet, an event held in conjunction with the teachers' institute. Music adds to the spirit of good cheer and friendly fellowship. Dinner is served, and routine matters of announcement, business, and other preliminaries are quickly disposed of by the presiding officer. The president of the teachers' association is called upon to introduce the principal speaker of the evening.

SAUL AMONG THE PROPHETS

The president takes the microphone and proceeds, in characteristic fashion, to relate in some detail the Nation-wide search for the most distinguished speaker, with the most profound message, to be found in all the land and concludes his eulogy of high and mighty tributes by introducing Mr. B. Officially and ostensibly, Mr. B is the personnel director of the New York Stock Exchange; actually, as it is to appear later, he is quite another character.

As he rises to speak, I am impressed most favorably indeed by his easy, pleasing manner, his genial, happy smile, and his fascinating personality. Age has not stolen his youth; life has not dimmed his light. As he speaks, I hear the soft, soothing voice of a kindly man who might grace the pulpit in a devotional service—a voice in harmony with the spirit and beauty of a great cathedral. I can all but hear the last lingering tones of the pipe organ and the hovering reverberations of the final note of the choir. With deep gratitude, Mr. B expresses his unbounded joy at being in our midst again after 4 long years of painful separation and his profound appreciation of the privilege of speaking to us, his beloved friends and companions. And then, with persuasive words, studied but suave and pervading, he tells us that we, the leaders of public education, are responsible for the only really big business of the Nation—that all other big business sinks into insignificance in comparison. Multiplied millions of children in our schools, billions in our budgets, and the ultimate destiny of humanity and civilization in our hands, makes of us the greatest of all big business executives. We hang on every word, we thrill with the thought, we drink it in and expand almost visibly. We are being prepared—prepared for the operation to follow, the removal of our social intelligence.

With his admiring audience thus prepared—conditioned—Mr. B with all the skill and technique of a great surgeon proceeds to fabricate a beautiful halo to hide the horns of big business and to shroud the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Liberty League, and the rugged individualists in a holy robe of human sympathy, benevolence, and generosity. We are piously persuaded that the New York Stock Exchange is the Hull house of humanity and that Wall Street is paved with piety and justice.

SALVATION THROUGH FAITH IN THE RICH

We listen eagerly to the soul-stirring stories of how men and women of wealth in almost every community are literally pining away, sick at heart, and lonely because the school officials have not asked them to donate a pipe organ for the new high-school auditorium or given them a chance to know the great joy of serving their fellowmen. We are moved almost to tears by the pathos of the account of how one dear little old lady of wealth was finally given her chance.

A campaign for welfare funds had fallen short of its goal. The guest of a committeeman, a stranger to the town, was present at the meeting of the committee in which they despaired of all hope. At this point the stranger ventured to ask, "Are there no rich people in your town?" The answer was, "Yes; an old lady who is very wealthy." "Will you go with me now to see her?" the stranger asked. It was agreed. They went. With tears in his voice, Mr. B unfolded to us a beautiful vision of this dear little old lady writing out a check for $500. Oh! the joy on the dear little lady's face. We all stood up reasonably well under this dramatic parable, but the sequel pulled handkerchiefs from the hips of all but the hard of heart.

It seems that the stranger returned to the city some years later, told his friend that there was just one person he wished more than any other to see, namely, the little old lady. Was she still living? Was she well? Might he see her? Yes; he could see her—see her alone. He went to her home. She was in the garden walking among her roses. The stranger introduced himself and recalled the occasion of their former meeting. Did she remember? The joy on her face was her answer. "Would you like a rose for your buttonhole?" she asked. He would be delighted. She tenderly plucked a beautiful rosebud, excused herself, went into the house, and a moment later returned and pinned the rose on his lapel with trembling hands. They visited and he returned to the home of his friend. Then, he discovered to his amazement and consternation that the rose was pinned to his coat with a beautiful diamond pin. He rushed back to the home of the dear little old lady to apprise her of her mistake. But no! It was not a mistake. She assured him, with tears trickling down her radiant face, that it was just a little token of her appreciation of what he had done for her on that memorable occasion when she had been permitted, through his efforts, to contribute to human welfare—to serve her fellow man.

We are told in confidence that we are neglecting a great opportunity by not inviting 15 or 20 of the "kingpins" of business in our community to sit with us in our councils on educational policy and school support (a superboard of education). Some who were listening trembled slightly at the thought, recalling the "kingpin" power of "invisible government", "superboards", "kitchen cabinets", and "citizens' committees" they had known.

Some reflected on the attempted destruction of the Chicago school at the hands of a citizens' committee, kingpins of the first order. Others found cases closer home, but the "spell" of hypnosis was upon us, and such momentary pricks of intelligence were quickly removed by the skillful manipulations of Mr. B, our mental surgeon.

The "kingpins" of business were to tell us, also, just what business expects of the schools—good penmanship; stenographers who can spell correctly; clerks who can do arithmetic accurately; and remember to add the sales tax; supermechanics; supercosmetolo-gists; docile, uncritical servants of the status quo. There is no reference to the cultivation of social intelligence in the schools; no mention of citizenship in a democracy dedicated to human rights, social justice, and the general welfare of society.

THE SPELL IS BROKEN

If doubts arise again in the minds of the more skeptical, we are quickly put under by Mr. B's assuring us that schoolmen throughout the length and breadth of the land, year in and year out, are urging him, pleading with him, to come and speak at their institutes or talk to their student assemblies. These invitations are so frequent and so insistent that should he accept them all, which he would love to do more than anything else in the world, he would have no time for his duties in the stock exchange. On one occasion we hear that 75 letters had piled up on Mr. B's desk. Their neglect grieved him sorely. He took them to his superior for counsel. Later in the day the superior is reported to have said: "Mr. B, I have read every one of these letters; I am deeply moved; you must go." Finally, for the benefit of those to whom this report of how 75 appeals had moved the heart of the director of the New York Stock Exchange was insufficient evidence, Mr. B tells us, with tearful remorse, that at the present time there are 850 such appeals for his services piled on his desk in Wall Street. We grieve with him that the New York Stock Exchange has only one Mr. B. Wall Street probably grieves also.

The schoolmasters' banquet ends in prolonged applause. I applaud. I walk down the long corridor and hear on every hand, "Wasn't that a wonderful message." I shake myself violently. I strive, all but vainly, to get hold of my intelligence. I stop and stare about, feeling much as I once had after taking gas to have a tooth pulled. Then I see the cold, unmoved faces of a few men I know to be critical thinkers. They are not saying, "Wasn't that a wonderful message." Their presence helps. The spell is broken. The vision disappears—even the vision of the dear little old lady with the rose and the diamond pin disappears. I am myself again. I now see, and see clearly, that for the hour I have been the victim of the most subtle, most seductive, most plausible, and most vicious propaganda—propaganda cunningly conceived, perfectly planned, and masterfully executed by big business in the interest of the preservation of the status quo—propaganda coldly calculated to sway the schools of a nation into harmony and accord with that social philosophy which places property rights above human rights, individual welfare above the general welfare, and greed above all.

CONDITIONS IN EUROPE—ARTICLE BY LIVINGSTON HARTLEY

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an article published in the Washington Post of Thursday, March 19, 1936, entitled "Diminishing Crisis", written by Livingston Hartley. It seems to me to be such an able and careful analysis of the European situation that it is entitled to a permanent place in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Mar. 19, 1936]

DIMINISHING CRISIS—VALUE OF LEAGUE MACHINERY SEEN IN DELAY BY DECISION NOT TO FIGHT OVER RHINELAND MILITARIZATION

By Livingston Hartley

Hitler's latest blow at the treaty structure of peace has been followed by 12 frenzied days in Europe. These have been marked by constant negotiations, alarmist headlines, public anxiety, and statesmen scurrying across Europe, with the true situation obscured by a diplomatic fog which alternately lifts and thickens. Already, however, certain salient features of the present crisis are beginning to loom out of this fog which hides so much that is happening in London, Paris, and Berlin.

When German troops marched into the demilitarized zone of the Rhineland, France and Belgium were faced with two alternatives. The first was to take immediate military action against Germany, as permitted under the Locarno Treaty, should they "satisfy" themselves that immediate steps were "necessary." The second alternative was to refer Germany's action to the Council of the League of Nations, whose "recommendation" the Locarno Treaty bound them to carry out.

The decision of the French and Belgian Governments to choose the second alternative and avoid immediate military measures which would certainly have led to war, was consequently of the highest importance. It facilitated the League procedure of delay until first reactions cool, with consequent opportunity to bring about a satisfactory peaceful settlement. The long discussion and preparation that League procedure requires before forceful action is taken were probably never more necessary than now.

One salient feature of the present crisis is the radical difference it presents to the problem the Council had to confront in relation to the Ethiopian war. Germany occupied her own territory without any shooting, whereas Italy invaded the territory of a fellow member of the League with bombs, shells, and bullets. The practical difference between these two situations, however, is no more marked than the legal.

Mussolini's invasion of Ethiopia was a direct contravention of several articles of the League Covenant. Article 16 of the Covenant, providing for sanctions, was therefore invoked, and all the members of the League were bound by definite treaty obligations to take action against Italy.

Germany, in spite of her defiance of the Locarno Treaty, has not directly violated any article of the League Covenant. Her action, moreover, has been appealed to the League under the Locarno Treaty and not under the Covenant. Consequently, the fifty-odd members of the League who were not parties to Locarno have no obligation under the Covenant to take action against Germany. Disinterested nations, such as Argentina, Finland, and Siam, were bound by specific engagements to restrain Italian aggression. These same nations will have no legal obligation to fulfill any recommendations the League Council may make in the present crisis unless it is shown that German action veils uncontestable aggressive intent.

Military action against Germany is still a bare possibility, although developments at London have made it appear highly unlikely. It is generally agreed by military experts that the French and their allies are in a position to drive German troops out of the Rhineland and win a decisive victory over the Reich. Such a victory might create economic chaos in Germany, but it would also bring about the downfall of the Nazi government and end, perhaps for a decade, the German menace, which is the fundamental threat to the future of Europe.

The general staffs of France and her allies might be tempted to follow this course as an insurance against an even more serious European war in the next few years for two reasons: Germany is not yet ready, and Germany now stands alone. Their Governments, however, are restrained by other considerations. Even if military victory over Germany should be certain, the cost to all belligerents would be appalling.

The French undoubtedly have a logical case for smashing Nazi Germany now. Hitler may be sincere in his offer of 25 years of peace. But Hitler, or his successor, may no longer be sincere 2 years from now if the German war machine is then the most powerful in Europe. Progressive violations of treaties have weakened the faith of all nations in German engagements, no matter how solemnly accepted, and Nazi leaders have so often proclaimed their intention of uniting Austrians and all minorities of German "race" in the Reich that it takes optimism to believe they will stop at the present stage of their widely publicized program.

Military attack, however, is not the only means of destroying the growing German menace. Since Germany's gold reserve is only sufficient to cover some 2 percent of her annual imports, and since foreign trade plays so vital a role in maintaining an economic structure which has long tottered on the brink of an abyss, Germany is very vulnerable to economic and financial sanctions. Hitler himself is peculiarly susceptible to economic pressure, because the big German industrialists have long been a principal bulwark of his real political power. In view of these conditions, there is reason to believe that a boycott of German exports alone might suffice to bring the Reich to terms in the Rhineland, or to cause the downfall of the Nazi Government. Sanctions, consequently, are being given consideration by some of the governments represented in London.

The problem is still very different from that created by the Ethiopian war, because the non-Locarno members of the League have no obligation to enforce sanctions to make Germany withdraw her troops from the Rhineland. Nevertheless, trade statistics indicate that a boycott of German exports by relatively few European powers might be exceedingly effective. But the more effective against Germany, the more sanctions would injure the nations applying them, if few in number.

Sanctions against Germany are not impossible if the efforts of the League Council to reach a satisfactory settlement fail, even though the Italian Government is opposed to participating in any sanctionist measures. But Italian objection to collective economic action against Germany is not necessarily decisive.

The decisive influence in the Council's final action is not Italy but Great Britain. Since the national interests of Great Britain and France are divergent in the present crisis, the first problem at London is a compromise solution which will serve them both. France and Belgium might be brought to accept a settlement with Germany along the lines proposed by Hitler through a definite British guaranty of their eastern frontier, or the British Government might participate in economic sanctions against Germany in exchange for a French agreement to stand by collective security in the Ethiopian war.

Italy, while a vitally important participant in military action against Germany, stands to lose out if the Rhineland problem is dealt with along either of these two lines. Mussolini, therefore, must tread lightly in London in obstructing the action of the Council and perhaps even show restraint in his attitude toward the terms of an African peace.

The present crisis is potentially the most dangerous that Europe has traversed since 1918, yet every indication now proclaims that it will be settled by negotiation. Those who observe the scene at London and remember the aftermath of that pistol shot at Sarajevo must realize that there has been some progress in international life and recognize the practical utility, however, dilatory and devoid of dash and drama, of the machinery of the League of Nations.

TAXATION OF BANK SECURITIES OWNED BY THE R. F. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 3978, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity is, on page 2, to strike out section 2 and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 2. Effective upon the date of enactment of this act, interest charges on all loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to closed banks and trust companies, now in force, or made subsequent to the date of enactment of this act, shall not exceed $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent per annum on condition that the rate of interest charged debtors of such banks or trust companies shall not exceed $4\frac{1}{2}$ percent per annum; otherwise such interest rate shall be as fixed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation: Provided, however, That no provision of this act shall be construed to authorize a reduction in the rate of interest on such loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation retroactive from the date of enactment of this act.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, I thought yesterday that we had an understanding that this bill would not be considered for at least a day or two, certainly not today. It may be that is not correct, but that was my understanding, and I talked both to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I had no understanding at all with anybody except that the amendment of the House would lie on the table and be taken up today. That was my understanding.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BENSON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator want more time in which to consider the matter?

Mr. BENSON. I certainly should like to have more time.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest that more time be accorded to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understand that there is a reason for considering the House amendment now and finally disposing of the bill. The reason is that, unless the bill is acted upon, in certain States taxes will be collected today. I had no information of any suggestion for a delay in its consideration. No one has mentioned the matter to me, so far as I recall.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. President, the amendment in which we are asked to concur involves a very important matter. I do not propose to permit it to be acted upon at this time without registering some protest.

During the time I have been in the Senate I have heard many Senators on the Republican and the Democratic sides of the Chamber talk about State rights. It seems to me it is about time that, rather than talk about State rights, we should vote in the direction of maintaining them.

Here is a measure which we are asked to rush through Congress at the request of certain privileged interests in the country in order that they may escape the payment of just taxes which should be levied upon them, and which the States ought to have a right to levy.

This fight has been before Congress for many years. The Committee on Banking and Currency have refused to report out of the committee a bill which would permit my State, the State of Minnesota, to tax our national banks as we tax other banks in Minnesota and as we tax other business institutions in that State.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BENSON. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is nothing to prevent Minnesota from changing her laws so she may tax banks along with other institutions. All the State of Minnesota has to do is to enact a law to that effect.

Mr. BENSON. No; there is nothing to prevent it except an act of Congress and the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the State of Minnesota against First National Bank. That is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. It depends on the State law. It does not depend on an act of Congress, as I understand.

Mr. BENSON. That may be the way the Senator from Florida understands it, but that is not correct. It depends entirely upon an act of Congress. The Senator from Florida knows, and every Senator here knows, that the Supreme Court has held that we cannot tax national banks except as Congress permits States to tax them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BENSON. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator knows perfectly well that if the Legislature of Minnesota should enact a law taxing moneyed capital in competition with national banks, that would settle the matter so far as Minnesota is concerned.

Mr. BENSON. The Senator from Virginia knows very well that the State of Minnesota should have a perfect right to tax national banks on the same basis that it taxes State banks in Minnesota operating in competition with national banks, but the Banking and Currency Committee of the United States Senate refuse even to vote upon the question and have so refused for years and years.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate for the last 12 years have voted upon the question time after time and have invariably taken the position that Minnesota could adjust the matter by a legislative act. There was no need for the Banking and Currency Committee to report a bill to disturb the situation in all the other States merely in order to accommodate Minnesota.

Mr. BENSON. In answer to the Senator from Virginia I must say that the Senator must know that if a law were enacted by Congress permitting not only Minnesota but every State in the Union to tax national banks on the same basis on which State banks are taxed, it would not disturb the taxing powers of any State, but would give Minnesota the right to tax national banks as she taxes State banks.

Mr. GLASS. It would disturb conditions in many of the other States.

Mr. BENSON. In just what manner would it disturb them?

Mr. GLASS. Minnesota can settle the matter for herself. If she would enact a law taxing moneyed capital in competition with national banks and in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, that would settle the matter so far as Minnesota is concerned.

Mr. BENSON. For the information of Senators I wish to say that in the case of the State of Minnesota against First National Bank of St. Paul, the Supreme Court of the United States held that Minnesota could not tax national banks if there was any money in Minnesota coming in competition with national banks, even though it be in the hands of private individuals loaned, we will say, on real estate mortgages on which there is merely a mortgage registration tax. If the Senator from Virginia wants to concur in that kind of legislation on the part of the Supreme Court, I hope he will so acknowledge it here before the United States Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I concur in all the decisions of the Supreme Court even when I disagree with them.

Mr. BENSON. I presume the Senator also concurs in legislation on the part of the Supreme Court.

Mr. GLASS. No; I do not think the Supreme Court legislates.

Mr. BENSON. It did in that case.

Mr. GLASS. I do not agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, money in State banks, and the capital stock and surplus of State banks, are in competition with the same items in the case of national banks.

Mr. BENSON. They certainly are.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. So to tax the national banks would only put them on a parity with the State banks.

Mr. BENSON. My colleague is correct. The senior Senator from Minnesota is familiar with this situation, and knows well that in Minnesota we do not propose to tax national banks in any other manner than that in which we tax State banks. That should and ought to be done, and Minnesota should have a right to do that. I repeat, however, that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate has refused for many years to report out of committee a bill which would permit the State of Minnesota to do that; and, as a result, this year Minnesota is to lose $2,000,000 in taxes which we otherwise would collect. For that reason I am very vitally interested in this bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BENSON. Yes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The national banks of Minnesota for years have recognized the equity of the contention for which the Senator speaks to the extent that for a long period of years they have voluntarily paid taxes which under the law could not be assessed against them.

Mr. BENSON. That is correct. For many years—in fact, since 1928, when this case was decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, as my colleague has stated—all but six, I believe, of the national banks in Minnesota have voluntarily paid their taxes. This year, however, they have served notice on our tax commission that they refuse further to pay their taxes as long as the Congress of the United States refuses to act upon this matter, and as long as the Banking and Currency Committee refuses to permit the United States Senate to vote upon the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that some bills on the subject are now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee. They have been referred to a subcommittee of which the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is chairman, and they are still before the subcommittee. They have not been acted upon by the Banking and Currency Committee; but I do not see how this bill interferes with that.

Mr. BENSON. I am very happy to know that at last they have referred the matter to a subcommittee; but I do not know that that is going to help the State of Minnesota a great deal. What we want is a change in the law in such a way as to permit us to tax national banks in the same manner that we tax other banks in our State.

In answer to the Senator's statement that the measure now under consideration has no bearing upon the subject upon which I speak, I wish to say that it seems to me it has a very material bearing, in that it is further strengthening the position of the national banks in this country, which say to Minnesota and say to 16 other States, and might very logically say to any State in the Union, "You have no right to tax us." In fact, in answer to the questions which have been suggested here, I wish to say that every lawyer here at least knows that according to decisions of our Supreme Court, a national bank could loan money in Oregon or Nebraska or Minnesota at 10 or 15 or 20 or 30 percent, and nothing could be done about it under the laws of those States, except that Congress has made that unlawful. Why could they not do the same thing regarding the taxation of banks? If the State of Virginia says it is unlawful to charge more than 6 percent interest, if it were not for an act of Congress the national banks there could exact 20 percent interest, and there is nothing that the State of Virginia could do about it.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no, Mr. President; the National Bank Act provides that no national bank shall charge a larger discount rate than is permitted by the statutes of the State in which it is located.

Mr. BENSON. The Senator from Virginia has answered my question. Why should not that also apply to the taxation of national banks?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Minnesota knows very well why the banks of his own State of Minnesota voluntarily paid this tax for a number of years. It was because they did not wish to be segregated as banks for special taxation. That is the only reason why they did it. Minnesota may settle the whole question, however, and collect its $2,000,000 by simply enacting a statute taxing moneyed capital in competition with banks just as it taxes banks.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BENSON. I do.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to say, by way of preliminary to my question, that I agree entirely with the Senator from Minnesota. The State of Washington is not only in the same position as is the State of Minnesota, but it is in a worse position, because our national banks have never been willing voluntarily to pay the tax. I agree that it is an outrage that Congress has never passed legislation under which they can be compelled to do so.

Talk about competing capital! Even when that statement is found in the reports of the United States Supreme Court, it is entirely false. It is not competing capital. If the State of Minnesota or the State of Washington desired to surrender to the banks of those States and drive out of business savings and loan associations and other kinds of institutions which are not competing with the banks, of course, they could do so; but this talk of banks about competing capital is a mere subterfuge. I think every State should be entitled to tax the banks within its borders; and I do not think the State of Washington or the State of Minnesota should be compelled to surrender to the banks in order to permit those banks to drive savings and loan associations out of business in our two States. I do not think the Federal Government should ask us to do that.

However, on this particular bill I am confronted with this problem: Since all the private owners of stock in banks in our State are exempt from taxation, since neither they nor anybody else have to pay any tax on bank stock, why should an agency of the United States Government be compelled to pay a tax on stock which it owns? That is the question with which I am confronted on this particular bill.

Mr. BENSON. The Senator from Washington has stated the position which I take much better than I myself could have stated it. In answer to the question which he raises, however, regarding the taxation of a Federal agency, I wish to say that I voted against the bill when it passed the Senate, and, had I the opportunity, I should again vote against it. I do not think the Federal agency should be exempt from taxation, even though the Congress of the United States does exempt from taxation those stocks in the hands of private individuals. I think the agency should pay the taxes, or compel the bank issuing the stock to pay the taxes. I do not think the State of Maryland or any other State should be denied the right to require that to be done; and that is the reason why I am entering this protest at this time, even though I realize that it is futile.

The Senator from Washington has mentioned, and I wish again to emphasize, the fact that the contention which the Supreme Court has raised, and the contention which the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate apparently subscribe to, is that Minnesota and 16 other States of the United States may repeal their taxes on moneys and credits. They may repeal their mortgage registration taxes. They have no right to tax their national banks on the same basis that they tax State banks. They may repeal their laws taxing building and loan associations. They have no right to segregate banks. They have a right to segregate cattle; they have a right to segregate household goods; they have a right to segregate every other type of property; but when it comes to banks, they cannot do that! If that is sound reasoning, I do not understand reasoning.

I wish to say further that this matter has gone so far that at the present time we have here in Washington a man holding a high official position under this administration—not my administration, but the present Democratic administration—who boasts of the fact that he does not pay taxes on the banks he owns. He boasts of it. He is proud of the fact. I think it is about time for us to enact legislation that will make it impossible for such a thing to continue.

So I say that I think the amendment of the House should be rejected, and the bill should be referred to a committee to consider the matter, in order that it may again come before Congress, because, in my opinion, it never has had a fair hearing.

INSPECTION AND ALLEGED SEIZURE OF TELEGRAMS, ETC.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, some days ago I was accorded the privilege of presenting to the Senate certain observations in connection with the process employed by the so-called lobby committee of the Senate which is acting under the authority of Senate Resolution 165. I desire at this time to add to the observations I then made.

I ought to make it clear at the beginning that I make no complaint against the subpoenas which have been issued by that committee merely upon the ground that they lack in particularity or that they are not sufficiently specific, not accurately descriptive of the papers desired. Nor do I make any point of the fact that subpoenas of the sort which are employed require a search on the part of the telegraph companies which, under some circumstances, might be oppressive, nor of any other matter which is distinctly procedural in its nature. For the purpose of the present discussion I am not interested in procedural phases.

I am interested in substantive rights of the citizen. A subpoena which requires the production of all messages between named persons and between specified dates is so general that it invades the constitutional right of the citizen under the fourth amendment. When a subpoena requires the production of messages which are not pertinent to any investigation which the Senate is qualified to make, and not material to any issue raised under the resolution, it invades the constitutional right of the citizen, and I urge that such a subpoena ought not to be used; that its use ought to be discontinued, not only by this committee, but by any other committee which may have fallen into the error of resorting to process of this kind.

At the time when I attempted to present this matter before I had not been supplied with a copy of any subpoena used by the committee except the one which had been referred to in the petition in a case filed in a local district court. My discussion upon an earlier occasion was limited to the subpoena which I then had in my possession. Subsequently, through the courtesy of the chairman of the committee, I have been furnished with other subpoenas. They are five in number, and I am assured by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] that these subpoenas are reasonably typical of the different subpoenas which the committee has employed during its investigation. I am advised many hundreds of subpoenas have been issued, and that there is no set form for that part of the subpoena which requires the production of papers. I understand the variations in the subpoenas are such that they fall into a number of different classes or categories, and, as I have said, the subpoenas which have been furnished to me are reasonably typical of the classes or types of process which the committee has employed.

I am going to ask at this point in my remarks that the five subpoenas be set out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the subpoenas were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATTACHMENT

All telegrams sent paid and received collect at _____ (city) between the dates of February 1 and August 1, 1935, and charged to the following:

(Company) _____
(Individuals) _____

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I have numbered the subpoenas for convenience in discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator read just one of the subpoenas, please? I have never seen one in print, and I do not know exactly what is contained in the subpoenas.

Mr. STEIWER. I shall be happy to do that. I was saying that I have numbered the subpoenas for convenience in discussion.

Subpena no. 1 is entirely specific and definite. I have no criticism to make of it and am placing it in the RECORD in order to offer all of the subpoenas which were supplied to me by the chairman of the so-called lobby committee, and in order that my presentation may be a fair presentation of the processes employed by the committee.

Subpena no. 2 is not equally specific as subpena no. 1; yet I concede it might be justified, and I submit no observations concerning it.

Subpenas nos. 3, 4, and 5, however, fall within the condemnation of the legal principles which I cited in the earlier debate on this question, and, at the request of the Senator from California, and in order that Senators may know exactly what it is that confronts us, I am going to read from each of these subpoenas that portion which requires the production of the telegrams.

Before I read I should say that in no case do these copies disclose the names of the senders of the subpoenaed telegrams. The chairman of the committee thought it unwise, or he was unwilling, to disclose those names, and I did not insist upon that disclosure, because I am in no way interested in the identity of the people whose telegrams are being seized. I am interested only in the process itself, and to the effect of the procedure upon the people of the United States.

I now read the portion of subpena no. 3, to which I made reference:

— to produce all telegrams sent, paid, and/or received collect between the dates of February 1 and November 19, 1935, and charged to — at — (city), and all of its associates, affiliates, and subsidiaries; and all of their known officers, employees, and agents.

From subpena no. 4 I read also the language which requires the production of papers, as follows:

— to produce all telegrams sent, paid, and/or received collect between the dates of February 1 and November 19, 1935, and charged to —.

Evidently that is the space provided for the name of the individual.

At — (city).

That evidently is the space provided for the city of the individual's residence.

Now, from subpena no. 5 I read the portion which requires the production of messages, which is as follows:

— and to produce at said time and place all telegrams as per the attachment.

And the attachment which is supplied to me and which is attached to the form of subpena, reads as follows:

All telegrams sent paid and received collect at — (city) —

Leaving a space for the name of the city—

between the dates of February 1 and August 1, 1935, and charged to the following:

Leaving a space for the names of companies and a further space for the names of individuals.

A fair general characterization of these three types of subpoenas is that they require the production of all telegrams sent between specified dates by named persons at named telegraphic offices. They demand no particular telegram; they demand no telegram on any specific or particular subject. There is in this process nothing from which the witness upon whom the subpoena is served, or any other person, could determine what is relevant and what is not relevant. Obviously compliance with this subpoena means that the telegraph company must produce for the inspection of the committee and its agents and employees every telegram sent by the persons whose names are endorsed on the subpoena within the times specified. Of course, if those telegrams relate to material that is not related to the question of lobbying, and if in particular the telegrams relate to private matters, it inevitably follows that compliance with the subpoena means that the privacy of the citizen is invaded.

In an earlier debate in this matter the Senator from Alabama advised the Senate that its committee was following the procedure always followed heretofore. I quote from page 3228 of the RECORD, from a statement made by the Senator from Alabama:

Now, I desire to make this statement to the Senate: Your committee is proceeding in exactly the same line of policy and under the same type of proceedings that have characterized every investigating committee since the first resolution of investigation was adopted in 1792.

Mr. President, I am not going to contradict the statement; in part it is a true statement; but I will say that my own investigation of different actions taken by Senate and House fails to support that statement. I will say also that the Library of Congress, after having its attention directed to the one case upon which the committee relies as authority for their procedure, advises me they can find no record that that case has ever been followed by Senate or House in the entire history of this country.

By the one case I mean one determination by one of the legislative branches of the Congress that a witness was bound to furnish the information which is required by subpoenas of this sort.

As I stated in the earlier debate, there is one case which supports the procedure of the committee. That case was identified in the discussion between the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] and myself as the case in which the House held in contempt Mr. E. W. Barnes in the year, I think, 1877. By reason of the reliance of the committee upon that decision of the House I feel justified in calling attention to the facts underlying that action and to point out to the Senate the infirmities of the decision and the complete lack of justification for its use in supporting procedure employed at this time.

In that action of the House, Mr. President, we find, in the first place, that the contempt order was voted by a minority of the House. I make no particular point of that. It is a thing which might often happen. But the number of absentees and the number of those who voted in opposition to the order of contempt was considerably in excess of those who voted affirmatively.

A matter of more importance, however, is that the proceeding was itself impeached by lack of a valid subpoena. In the RECORD of the Forty-fourth Congress, second session, at page 452, we find the form of what purports to be a subpoena. It is very brief and I read from it:

To JOHN G. THOMPSON, Esq., Sergeant at Arms, or his special messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon E. W. Barnes, manager of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at New Orleans, La., to be and appear before the Louisiana affairs special committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which Hon. William R. Morrison is chairman, and with you bring all telegrams sent or received by William Pitt Kellogg, S. B. Packard, John F. Casey, J. R. Pittkin, Henry C. Dibble, H. C. Warmoth, George W. Carter, and General Augur at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Co., New Orleans, from and after the 15th day of August 1876. * * *

I perceive no difference between a subpoena which directs the production of "all telegrams" from and after a certain date, and a subpoena which directs the production of "all telegrams" between certain named dates, and I very cheerfully concede that so far as the form of the subpoena is concerned it is sufficiently identical with the form of the subpoena at present used by the committee. But I have read this language to call attention to the fact that it is not in form a subpoena running to the witness Barnes or to any other person. It is merely a direction to the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives to command and summon the witness, and there is nothing in the record to disclose that any subpoena was ever issued by the Sergeant at Arms or by any other person.

I imagine there would be no contention that the Sergeant at Arms would be authorized to issue a subpoena in any event. I merely mention this to show the confusion of mind with which the House considered the case of Mr. Barnes, and the utter confusion of mind when they finally voted by a minority vote to hold the witness in contempt when, in fact, so far as the record discloses, he had never been served with a subpoena.

Another infirmity, and a still more serious infirmity, in the proceedings at that time is that there seems to have been a parole modification of this order. We find it at page 454 of the RECORD. It appears there that the witness Barnes, when he was before the bar of the House, made this statement:

On the 13th of December 1876 I was informed by the person handing me the subpoena—

The subpoena in question was the copy of the order made by the committee to the Sergeant at Arms—

I was informed by the person handing me the subpoena that William R. Morrison, chairman of the committee, desired to see me, and I accordingly waited upon him.

Mr. Morrison asked me when I could furnish those messages.

I informed him that the search would take some time and would require finding all the messages of the parties named.

Mr. Morrison said, "We only need the campaign messages."

That ends the quotation. The investigation in question related to an election in the State of Louisiana. Throughout the debate it appears, first, that this statement of the witness was never impeached or contradicted, and, second, that the debate proceeded upon the assumption that this statement by the witness was a true statement. It was referred to by a number of different Representatives in the discussion which ensued upon the floor of the House.

So we are confronted with the fact that the subpoena itself was not a subpoena, but that if it be regarded as such that it was varied by the parole instructions of the chairman of the committee, and as varied it ceased to be the dragnet subpoena against which I am complaining at this time; but it became an order to produce certain relevant, and not irrelevant, messages.

A third infirmity, Mr. President, is that the proceedings were further impeached by the equivocal basis upon which the respondent witness, Barnes, was held in contempt. I can illustrate what I mean by my characterization "equivocal basis" by reading briefly from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to which I have referred. At page 604 we find that a question was raised concerning the precise proposition before the House. The question was raised as to what it was that this respondent witness had done that he was to be held in contempt by action of the House. I read briefly:

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the gentleman would state whether the committee has found in that report—I did not catch the entire reading of it—that this subpoena was a proper subpoena to him, on which we can base proceedings for contempt.

I interject there to say that Representative Knott was the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and seemed to be in charge of this proceeding after the special committee had brought in its resolution for contempt. Mr. Knott answered as follows:

In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that a majority of the committee were of the opinion that this was a legal and sufficient subpoena. There were others on the committee who denied its efficiency, who nevertheless concurred unanimously in the resolutions presented as the conclusions of the committee.

The resolution, Mr. President, discloses that it was not, strictly speaking, a resolution of contempt. And then a more important question was put. Mr. Garfield made this statement:

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the gentleman would put it in a shape where the House can demand an answer to the questions propounded, and if he refuses the contempt will be in his refusal to do it, but not the refusal to answer under this subpoena.

Mr. KNOTT. If the gentleman had listened to the resolutions, he would have found that they required that precisely to be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; but I would like to hear the resolutions again read.

The clerk again read the resolutions.

Mr. GARFIELD. A single question more. As I understand, from the reading of the resolutions, there is nothing in them that lays the foundation for a contempt for not heretofore producing the messages called for. If the witness shall refuse to produce them now, that will be the foundation for the contempt; is that it?

Mr. KNOTT. The gentleman can put his own construction upon the resolutions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to know the construction that the committee puts upon them.

Mr. KNOTT. The construction of the committee is contained in the report. The resolutions are susceptible of the construction that the witness will be in contempt if he violates the order now made or sought to be made in the first resolution.

Thus it appears that this witness could have been held in contempt for either his failure to produce the telegrams or for his failure to answer interrogatories propounded of him at the bar of the House. And there is nothing in that discussion which shows the real basis for the order which the House subsequently made.

After that discussion there followed a considerable volume of further debate, and finally the House, after a great deal of confusion, came to its conclusion, which is found on page 608 of the same RECORD.

At that time the resolution, which I have just referred to, and which was discussed by Mr. Garfield and Mr. Knott, was withdrawn and another resolution submitted to the House. The second resolution apparently holds the witness, Barnes, in contempt for failure to produce the papers required by the subpoena, but even this conclusion is not a perfectly safe one. After the last resolution was offered there ensued certain further discussion, which indicated a difference of opinion as to what it was that the House was proceeding to do. I think I have never examined a parliamentary record more replete with confusion than is the record from which I am reading. It well deserves the examination of any Senator.

Finally, growing out of that conclusion was a vote holding Mr. Barnes in contempt.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Did not the committee hold by a majority in that case, though, that the subpoena which the Senator from Oregon has read into the record was a valid subpoena?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; the majority of the committee thought so, basing their view on the case of the United States against Babcock, which has been repudiated throughout history ever since. However, I will come to the Babcock case a little later.

Subsequently, the House took further action in which they directed that the witness might go in custody of the Sergeant at Arms back to New Orleans for the purpose of endeavoring to find out whether he could, in fact, produce the messages. It seems that he had been superseded in the office of which he had been in charge, and a serious question was presented as to whether he could comply with the subpoena, even if he desired to comply with it. The last action of the House was that by which they permitted the witness to go in custody to see if he could produce the messages. I cannot find that subsequently there was any further effort to hold Mr. Barnes in contempt, nor that any penalty was visited upon him by reason of his failure to respond to the subpoena in the first place.

I just said, in answer to the inquiry made by the Senator from Indiana, that a majority of the committee regarded the subpoena as being sufficient and adequate. They filed with the House a report in which they set forth their views, and they based their conclusion in their written report, to a large extent, upon the authority of the case of the United States against Babcock, which is reported in Third Dillon at page 567.

In that case, Mr. President, the question of the constitutional right of the witness was not raised. The case stands entirely upon the sufficiency of the form of the subpoena. It was urged that the subpoena was not sufficiently specific. The Court held that the subpoena was good, upon the ground upon which it had been attacked, but there is no reference that I can find from an examination of the case to the fourth amendment or to the right of the citizen under that amendment, and no contention that his right had been denied by the proceeding in the case. Nevertheless, the case was relied upon. At that time it was the only American case of any consequence that could have been relied upon to sustain the view of the majority of the committee.

Very shortly after that, however, the question came up squarely in Missouri, and in the Missouri case the Babcock case was discussed. I am referring now to the case of Ex parte Brown, which is reported in Seventy-second Missouri Reports at page 93. Before Ex parte Brown was considered by the Supreme Court of Missouri, there occurred the second annual meeting of the American Bar Association. At that meeting a lawyer of considerable reputation read a paper in which he discussed the question of the right to take messages from telegraph offices and particularly the process which ought to be employed in seeking that kind of evidentiary material. In this very able paper, the writer, Mr. Henry Hitchcock, urged that the action taken by the House and the holding by the Court in the Babcock case were alike in error. Here is what he says in his final summary of the action of the House in the Barnes case. I quote from page 6 of the paper to which I have referred:

It will hardly be claimed, under the circumstances, that this action of the Judiciary Committee and of a minority of the House of Representatives can be accepted as a judicial authority. It was taken at a time of extraordinary excitement, in connection with political controversies of the gravest character, by a parliamentary and not a judicial body, all parties composing which were deeply interested in the possible results of the disclosures sought. If the doctrine maintained by the House Judiciary Committee is to be upheld by the courts, then not only each House of Congress but equally each house of every State legislature is armed with the power, at will, through a committee or otherwise, to compel the production and inspection at any time of every private message remaining on file in any and every telegraph office within their respective States—not as being competent or relevant to any inquiry before it but for the mere purpose of finding out what evidence, pertinent or not pertinent to such inquiry, the messages there accumulated may disclose.

This paper, Mr. President, has been referred to a number of times by the courts of this country.

I said a moment ago that the Babcock case upon which the House committee based its reliance was considered by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the case of Ex parte Brown. In the Brown case the form of subpoena was substantially the same as the form of subpoena in the Babcock case and substantially the same as the pseudosubpoena which was employed in the case in which Mr. Barnes was held in contempt by the House of Representatives. I will not read the form of the subpoena. It is set out, however, in the decision and discloses that production is required of all papers sent by the persons named between certain dates named in the subpoena. I will read only what the court said in respect to the constitutional question which is involved. I read from page 93 of volume 72 of the Missouri reports:

The only remaining question is, whether the messages, the production of which was commanded by the process, were described with sufficient accuracy, to justify the court in compelling obedience to it. The twenty-third section of our Bill of Rights declares: "That the people ought to be secure in their persons, papers, houses and effects, from unreasonable searches and seizures, and no warrant to search any place, or seize any person or thing can, issue without describing the place to be searched or the thing to be seized, as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation."

That ends the quotation from the Bill of Rights. I now proceed with the opinion:

We are not prepared to agree with the court of appeals that this section has "but little bearing upon the present question, except by way of argument and illustration"; but if it has no other bearing upon the question, the argument and illustrations drawn from it possess a cogency not to be despised. The section declares—

I should interrupt myself there by reminding Senators, as they already know, that the provision of the bill of rights of the State of Missouri is, in substance and effect, identical with the provision of the fourth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I quote further from the opinion:

This section declares that the people ought to be secure in their papers from unreasonable searches, and whether a subpoena duces tecum for papers, or search warrant for chattels be issued, the spirit of that section demands that while in the latter case there must be probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, with a description in the warrant of the place to be searched, or the thing to be searched for, in the other, it shall at least give a reasonably accurate description of the paper wanted, either by its date, title, substance, or the subject it relates to, and that it shall be shown to the court or authority issuing the process that there is a cause pending in a court and that the paper is material as evidence in the cause. To permit an indiscriminate search among all the papers in one's possession for no particular paper, but some paper which may throw some light on some issue involved in the trial of some cause pending, would lead to consequences that can be contemplated only with horror, and such a process is not to be tolerated among a free people. A grand jury has a general inquisitorial power. They may ask a witness coming before them, without reference to any particular offense which is a subject of inquiry, what he knows touching the violation of any section of the criminal code. Give such a body, in addition, the power to search any man's papers for evidence of some crime committed, and you convert it into a tribunal which would soon become as odious to American citizens as the star chamber was to Englishmen, or the Spanish Inquisition to the civilized world.

Here communications, at different times within a period of 15 months, sent or received by the parties named, are called for. The date, title, substance, or subject matter of none of them is given, and is utterly impossible that it could have been made to appear, without more, than any of the messages were material as evidence before the grand jury. Moreover, it not only called for all messages between the parties named, but for all which may have been sent or received by either of the parties, to or from any person on the face of the earth. A compliance with the order might have resulted in the production of confidential communications between husband and wife, client and attorney, confessor and penitent, parent and child. Matters which it deeply concerned the parties to keep secret from the world, and of no importance or value as evidence in any cause, might thus be disclosed to the annoyance and shame of the only persons interested.

Incidents in the lives of members of families which the happiness and welfare of the household require to be kept secret might be exposed, and offenses not recognizable by the law, long since committed and condoned, brought to light and hawked through the country by scandalmongers, to the disturbance of the peace of society and the destruction of the happiness of whole households. It is no answer to this that the obligation of secrecy imposed by law on grand juries would prevent such exposure. It is enough to disturb and harass a man that 12 of his neighbors, though sworn to secrecy, have acquired knowledge diminishing their respect for him, which they had no right to obtain, and they may be the very 12 men with whom, above all others, he most desired to be in good repute. Such an inquisition, if tolerated, would destroy the usefulness of this most important and valuable mode of communication by subjecting to exposure the private affairs of persons intrusting telegraph companies with messages for transmission to the prying curiosity of idle gossips, or the malice of malignant mischief makers.

This case has been followed in very many jurisdictions.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he will not yield long enough for us to have a vote on the amendment of the House which I endeavored to bring up a little while ago?

Mr. STEIWER. I would prefer not to yield for that purpose at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat the citation from which he just read?

Mr. STEIWER. It is Ex parte Brown, reported in volume 72 of Missouri reports, page 93.

Mr. WALSH. Has the Senator the citation showing that that decision has been approved and commended by other courts?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; and I shall come to that in a moment. The case has been cited with approval and followed in numerous courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States. I shall come to that directly.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Did the Missouri case discuss the precedent which had been established in the House and which the Senator has been discussing?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; Ex parte Brown was considered by the Supreme Court upon appeal from an intermediate court. The intermediate court did discuss the action of the House in the Barnes matter and relied on it. The decision from which I have been reading is a decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Missouri reversing the action of the intermediate court and disowning and repudiating the Barnes case. Generally speaking, the Barnes case has been repudiated and the Babcock case has been repudiated. Very few opinions in the United States cite those cases to this proposition. They may cite them on some other proposition but not on this one.

Mr. MINTON. Did they repudiate them as parliamentary precedents or as judicial precedents?

Mr. STEIWER. Courts deal only with judicial questions.

Mr. MINTON. Certainly; and it can very well be seen that the Barnes case, which was a parliamentary question, would not be at all applicable in a court of law and might be repudiated by every court, and yet be a binding parliamentary precedent.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Indiana made a suggestion like that in the earlier debate on this question. I then expressed my dissent from his position. Nothing will be gained by outlining my dissent in detail. I said then, and I say now, the question finally becomes a judicial question. No citizen is to be deprived of his rights under the Constitution of the United States without opportunity to resort to a petition in habeas corpus, which would finally take the case to the courts, and when the case goes to the courts it will be determined in accordance with the judicial utterances with which we are all becoming familiar.

I desire now to call attention very briefly to what was said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hale against Henkel, reported in Two Hundred and First United States Reports, at page 43. I read first from page 76:

We are also of opinion that an order for the production of books and papers may constitute an unreasonable search and seizure within the fourth amendment. While a search ordinarily implies a quest by an officer of the law, and a seizure contemplates a forcible dispossession of the owner, still, as was held in the Boyd case, the substance of the offense is the compulsory production of private papers, whether under a search warrant or a subpoena duces tecum, against which the person, be he individual or corporation, is entitled to protection. Applying the test of reasonableness to the present case, we think the subpoena duces tecum is far too sweeping in its terms to be regarded as reasonable.

At page 77 the court said:

If the writ had required the production of all the books, papers, and documents found in the office of the MacAndrews & Forbes Co., it would scarcely be more universal in its operation or more completely put a stop to the business of that company. Indeed, it is difficult to say how its business could be carried on after it had been denuded of this mass of material, which is not shown to be necessary in the prosecution of this case, and is clearly in violation of the general principle of law with regard to the particularity required in the description of documents necessary to a search warrant or subpoena. Doubtless many, if not all, of these documents may ultimately be required, but some necessity should be shown, either from an examination of the witnesses orally, or from the known transactions of these companies with the other companies implicated, or some evidence of their materiality produced, to justify an order for the production of such a mass of papers. A general subpoena of this description is equally indefensible as a search warrant would be if couched in similar terms.

Then the Supreme Court cites the case we have been discussing, namely, Ex parte Brown.

Mr. President, it is interesting to note that the courts generally have regarded this citation by the Supreme Court as an adoption by that Court of the theory of the case of Ex parte Brown on the approval of its holding, and the Federal courts subsequently have followed the case of Ex parte Brown on the theory that the Supreme Court vindicated and approved the holding there made.

As an illustration of what is said by the courts, let me call attention to the case of United States against Terminal Railway Association, reported in One Hundred and Fifty-fourth Federal Reports, commencing at page 268. I read from page 271:

In Ex parte Brown (72 Mo. 83, 96; 37 Am. Rep. 426) a very carefully considered case on that subject, the Court expressly declined to follow that case, saying:

"The case of Babcock v. United States (3 Dill. 567; Fed. Cas. No. 14484) relied upon as an authority as to the sufficiency of the identification of the telegrams, supports the view it is cited to sustain; but, with the highest respect for the learning and ability of the judges who granted the order for the subpoena in that case, we cannot agree with them. Their opinion, delivered by Judge Dillon, is totally at variance with our convictions on the subject."

Then the Federal district court said, after quoting the language which I have just read:

This decision of the Supreme Court of Missouri was cited with approbation and followed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hale v. Henkel, supra, thus practically adopting the refusal of that Court to follow the views of Judge Dillon in United States v. Babcock.

An interesting case in the United States district court is the case of Federal Trade Commission against Lorillard Co., reported in Two Hundred and Eighty-third Federal Reports at page 999. I read some excerpts from that decision, commencing on page 1005. The court was discussing the fourth amendment and its application to the rights of the citizen, and it said:

This command of the Constitution, properly interpreted, is a prohibition against Congress granting powers to the Commission for unlimited searches and seizures of letters and documents. The act makes plain the duty of the Commission to gather, compile, and publish for use in its proceedings what may be voluntarily offered or submitted in response to request or demand. It may also make investigation independently, but the exercise of visitatorial power over private corporations must keep within restrictions of the fourth amendment: "Neither branch of the legislative department, still less any merely administrative body, established by the Congress, possesses, or can be invested with, a general power of making inquiry into the private affairs of the citizen."

Quoting from Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S. 478), a case to which I referred in an earlier debate on the same subject.

At page 1006 the district court makes this further statement:

In the papers submitted on this application, there is no showing of the existence of probable cause. The relief prayed for is in general terms and includes all papers and telegrams received by each respondent from its jobber customers located in different points throughout the United States and copies of all letters and telegrams sent by each respondent to such jobbers during the period from January 1, 1921, to December 31, 1921, inclusive. Such general demands made in other warrants of law, such as a subpoena duces tecum, have been condemned as not giving a reasonably accurate description of the papers wanted, either by date, title, substance, or subject to which they relate.

And here the district court quotes Ex parte Brown and also another case, Carson against Hawley, a Minnesota case, to which I have not called attention.

The court concludes with this statement:

To grant the relief prayed for by the petitioner would be to permit an unreasonable search and seizure of papers in violation of the fourth amendment. It was not the intention of Congress to grant such unlimited examination and inspection by the legislation in question; nor, indeed, did Congress have authority to do so under the commerce clause of the Constitution. It would be unreasonable and unjust to accede to the demands of the petitioner, and the application for the peremptory writ of mandamus against the respondents, American Tobacco Co. and P. Lorillard Co., is denied.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been very much interested in the Senator's discussion. He has just read an extract from the court's opinion saying, in that particular case, that there was no description of the information so that the telegram could be identified. I realize that the telegram ought to be identified just as well as it possibly can be; but this question has arisen in my mind since listening to the Senator:

Suppose a telegram was sent in code and there were, of course, no way to identify what the substance was. If we followed strictly the rule there laid down, would there be any way by which such information could be obtained? It might be, of course, as the Senator well knows, extremely important and vital in some great issue upon which the court was passing. How could the subject matter of the telegram be described, if the telegram were in code or if perhaps it were not known that it was in code when the subpoena was issued?

Mr. STEIWER. If it could be established that the telegram related to a matter which was relevant or pertinent, I have no doubt that a subpoena duces tecum could compel its production, to be decoded afterward. I have no doubt of that, just as its production might be required to be read afterward. There is no essential difference between reading it in plain English and decoding it, except that it would be much more difficult to decode it.

Mr. NORRIS. But if an official of a telegraph company were ordered to produce certain telegrams, and an effort were made to describe them, and the official of the company came across some telegrams in code, no matter how honestly he desired to comply with the order, he would not know, if he had to pass on the description of the subject matter, whether or not the telegram in code had any relation to the discussion. It would be impossible for him to know.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true. That illustrates the difficulties of the question. I appreciate the difficulties, I think, just as thoroughly as does the Senator from Nebraska; and yet those difficulties cannot by any stretch of the imagination operate to change the requirements of the fourth amendment, whatever they may be.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I understand that. The fourth amendment, however, ought to be construed in the light of present-day well-known existing scientific facts. If at one's peril, he had to describe the substance of a telegram, if it were sent, for instance, in code—and there might be various other ways in which deception could be brought about—it might be possible for the fourth amendment to stand squarely across the road to justice, and prevent us from obtaining evidence that was absolutely essential, probably where human life, or something of the kind, was at stake.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true at any time, even if there is no coded message. In a criminal case the guarantees of the Constitution often impede the opportunity of the State to conduct a successful prosecution. We do not, therefore, deny to the citizen his constitutional rights, however. Under a law, for instance, which prohibits the wife from testifying against the husband, I have no doubt many a guilty man has escaped; but where that law is applicable, nobody, and certainly not the Senator from Nebraska, would say that the law ought to be disregarded because of the practical difficulty in getting the evidence necessary for conviction.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I should not. The same thing might be truly said, also, of professional communications from a doctor to a patient.

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. But the general rule which sustains the rejection of such evidence or statements is that their admission would result in greater harm than good. Acknowledging that their exclusion might do harm in some instances, to protect the public generally it is necessary.

Where the fourth amendment is raised as an objection, ought we not, while not nullifying the amendment, to consider it in the light of the fact that if we are very strict in our construction the fourth amendment may be used as an absolute barrier to the production of evidence which every honest man would concede ought to be produced, and thus be used as a yoke instead of a protection to the innocent? It might become the instrument of great injustice instead of protecting the innocent.

Mr. STEIWER. I thoroughly agree with the Senator; and yet I cannot escape the conclusion that the suggestion he makes it applicable to every constitutional guaranty enjoyed by the citizen; and I take it that the courts—at least just courts—have always given due consideration to the practical difficulties, whichever way they may resolve the question.

In reference to a rather similar matter the Supreme Court has said in express terms that it is giving practical consideration to the difficulties which confront it. That becomes another subject for debate, so far as I am concerned. What I am trying to do at this time is to stress the fact that the courts almost universally—not universally, but almost universally—have sustained the right of the citizen against a search of his telegrams made in order to see if something will turn up that is material. I am reading the opinions of State courts and Federal courts merely to show what the great weight of authority is, so that we may conclude whether or not it is safe and proper to permit our committees to proceed in violation of what appears to be the plain contemplation of the fourth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

In connection with the language which I have just read, I wish to call attention to the fact that the Federal Trade Commission specifically was endeavoring to obtain telegrams sent between certain dates. It was also endeavoring to obtain other material and other information; but one of the things directly involved in that case was the effort of the Federal Trade Commission to obtain telegrams between certain specified dates. That is one of the things which the Court squarely held against, saying that the company could not be required, without showing materiality, to produce indiscriminately the relevant with the irrelevant; and thus, in effect, invade the privacy of the citizen.

I do not wish to intrude too long on the time of the Senate. I know the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] wishes to proceed with another legislative matter. I do wish, however, to refer to two more cases.

The first is a case from which I read in an earlier debate on this question—the case of Federal Trade Commission against American Tobacco Co. It appears in Two Hundred and Sixty-fourth United States Reports. The opinion of the Court is unanimous. I wish to read briefly from language commencing at the bottom of page 305:

Anyone who respects the spirit as well as the letter of the fourth amendment would be loath to believe that Congress intended to authorize one of its subordinate agencies to sweep all our traditions into the fire, and to direct fishing expeditions into private papers on the possibility that they may disclose evidence of crime. We do not discuss the question whether it could do so if it tried, as nothing short of the most explicit language would induce us to attribute to Congress that intent. * * * It is contrary to the first principles of justice to allow a search through all the respondents' records, relevant or irrelevant, in the hope that something will turn up.

Mr. President, this case also concerns the Federal Trade Commission. Is there no significance in the fact that the Supreme Court, in considering the powers of this important agency of our Government, denies to the Commission the right to do the very thing which our committee now seeks to do in acquiring the possession of telegrams?

I am wondering whether it will be contended that the two bodies of the Congress, acting as one of the coordinate branches of the constitutional Government under which we live, lacks the power to require production of certain classes of material before an agency like the Federal Trade Commission, but that one branch of the Congress, namely, the Senate, by agreement to a resolution and the appointment of a committee, can do that which the whole Federal Legislature is powerless to do.

It seems to me that these cases respecting the Federal Trade Commission and its want of power to make indiscriminate searches and to compel the production of the irrelevant along with the relevant, apply with a peculiar force to a committee of this body, and that our committees, if there is a difference, would enjoy a lesser degree of authority than the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. President, I wish to conclude with one more brief quotation from the Supreme Court of the United States. In the leading case of Boyd against United States, which is reported in One Hundred and Sixteenth United States Reports, there occurs the decision from which I read, at page 35, as follows:

Though the proceeding in question is divested of many of the aggravating incidents of actual search and seizure, yet, as before said, it contains their substance and essence and effects their substantial purpose.

It may be that it is the obnoxious thing in its mildest and least repulsive form; but illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of the person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon.

If that is to be said by the Supreme Court of the judiciary, with what greater force might it be added that the Members of the Senate of the United States, under their oaths to preserve the Constitution of the country, should also remain on their guard, and be watchful ever of the constitutional rights of the citizens of this country.

TAXATION OF BANK SECURITIES OWNED BY THE R. F. C.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3978) relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. BLACK rose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senate resume the consideration of the War Department Appropriation bill, in order that there may be something before the Senate for the Senator from Alabama to discuss.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11035) making appropriations for the military and non-military activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, on page 76, line 9, was agreed to.

INSPECTION AND ALLEGED SEIZURE OF TELEGRAMS, ETC.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, in the opening remarks of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], I understand him to join issue with me upon a statement I made to the effect that the special committee of the Senate had been following the same course with reference to seeking the production of telegrams under subpoena which other committees of this body and of the House of Representatives have followed since the beginning of congressional investigations.

It therefore becomes necessary for me to call attention to some of the subpoenas which have been issued, and in the course of my remarks I shall have occasion to call attention to subpoenas issued by a committee of which the Senator from Oregon is a member, the Committee on Banking and Currency, the service of which, according to his construction stated on the floor today and a few days ago, would have constituted unreasonable search and seizure, and would have meant that the Senator sat in the committee during the hearing considering matters produced under a subpoena which violated the constitutional rights of the witness before him.

I shall call attention to the fact that not only have subpoenas been issued to the telegraph companies which required that those companies produce all telegrams to and from certain individuals, but that while they were serving as members of a special committee Senators who ranked high in their regard for the Constitution and the right of citizens have actually called for telegrams from towns, asking for the production of every telegram sent or received by or to any individual in the town over a period of years.

I shall begin my remarks by reading from the general statement made by a gentleman who wrote a book on congressional investigations, and who made this brief summary with reference to the powers asserted by the Senate and the House of Representatives in connection with these investigations. I read from Mr. Eberling's book on congressional investigations, as follows:

Recapitulating, then, with reference to the power of Congress to force papers from witnesses we may say that congressional committees have assumed wide latitude in making such demands on persons, that while in practically every case where unlimited demands were made, they were strenuously opposed in Congress, yet the prevailing opinion in Congress has been that the amendments to the Constitution did not protect parties in such cases anyway, with the possible exception of the fifth amendment; that these proceedings were inquiries, not cases or trials at law, and that even though the rights of individuals were violated, such action was necessary in the interest of public welfare.

I simply call attention to that statement, without approving or disapproving the words mentioned by the writer, in order to direct attention to the fact that this man, who made a very careful scrutiny of all congressional investigations from the very earliest period of the history of this Nation, reached this conclusion.

Mr. President, there is absolutely nothing new in the attacks which have been made against the Senate committee in this regard. These attacks were made against all the committees. Some of the same papers which make the attacks today made them against all the other investigations. They made them against Senator Walsh and Senator WHEELER. They accused both of those gentlemen of running roughshod over the constitutional rights of citizens under all of the amendments of the Constitution, and the Constitution itself.

The same paper which a few days ago referred to a member of our committee as a "mud gunner" also referred, during the Teapot Dome inquiry, to Senator WHEELER and to Senator Walsh as the "twin mud gunners from the State of Montana."

I have photostatic copies of a large number of articles which appeared in these various papers not only with reference to the Teapot Dome inquiry but with reference to all of the inquiries, and the same statement has been made in each one. Almost the exact speech made by the Senator from Oregon was made on the floor of the House of Representatives in 1876 when the minority there objected to a committee getting the truth by summoning all the telegrams which the committee believed would be useful in obtaining the truth, and where the majority voted, each time the question was raised, to make those telegrams available for the use of the committee.

There is nothing new in this protest. It was very loud a week or two ago, but it has been loud in every investigation. There was a time during the investigation of Attorney General Daugherty, and during the investigation of Mr. Fall and others, who were portrayed on the floor of the Senate as being as white and "as pure as the driven snow", when the high tide was reached in the vilification of the present senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] particularly, and of the late Senator Walsh, of Montana.

I have before me an editorial appearing in the New York Times, I believe, in which, in substance, it is said that while Senator Walsh had reached an all-time high with reference to partisan politics in connection with the investigation, Senator WHEELER had reached an all-time low for ridiculousness in connection with the investigation; and the editorial called attention to the fact that Senator Walsh had actually asserted on the floor of the Senate that the Senate committee was not bound by the rules of evidence which applied in the courts of justice, where simple, direct issues were presented to be tried by a court.

So, Mr. President, there is absolutely nothing new in the opposition which is now made. There is absolutely nothing new in the effort to handicap committees. Always attempts have been made to whittle down the powers of committees; and it would be a wonderful thing for certain interests in the Nation if at this time they could have it known that at certain places throughout the country a petition might be presented to a judge to enjoin the appearance of witnesses before the Senate committee investigating campaign expenditures. All of us know that it would be impossible to get a final trial of such a case until after next November.

If it is true that a witness may be enjoined from bringing evidence to a Senate committee because it is in writing, a witness may also be enjoined by a district court from appearing before the Senate committee to give evidence in person, on the ground that the court believes the Senate committee does not have authority to make the investigation.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. During the Daugherty investigation—the Senator from Alabama was not in the Senate at the time—Mr. Mal Daugherty repeatedly came before the committee and stated that he and those connected with him were only too glad to have us investigate their bank. Finally we went out to Ohio with some subpoenas to investigate the bank, and put a man in the bank to go through the records. After he had been there for a short time he found some C. D.'s which had been made out to unknown persons. We went out there to hold a hearing. The bank people went into a probate court and got out an injunction to prevent us from obtaining the testimony from the bank. Then we cited Mr. Mal Daugherty for contempt, and the matter went to the Supreme Court, and finally the Supreme Court held that we were entitled to go into the matter.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. There was an effort in that case to prevent the obtaining of evidence.

The statement has been made that in the present case something new has been done. The Western Union Telegraph Co. perhaps knows the custom with reference to subpoenas as well as any of the newspapers which have protested against these subpoenas. It may be that some newspapers know more about it than does the Western Union Telegraph Co., because they may have a kind of omniscient knowledge of things which occur in the United States. But I have before me a telegram from the attorney for the Western Union Telegraph Co. which was received in response to an inquiry. All of us know, as the Western Union attorney stated in the court proceedings, that it is to the interest of the Western Union to decline to deliver telegrams if it may do so, and we all know that the Western Union does not deliver telegrams unless it is compelled to do so. It fights the production of telegrams, whenever it can, on the ground that the subpoena is too broad, or on any other ground. Let us see what the attorney for the Western Union said:

In reply to your inquiry of Saturday, we do not ordinarily preserve subpoenas served on the company, in cases where the company is not itself a party, for more than 6 years. From my personal knowledge, I can say that the company has been served with subpoenas in the general form—namely, all messages sent by A, from or received by A at a point named during a period specified—for at least 36 years.

Until about 1902 it was the uniform practice of the company, and its rules required, that before complying with such subpoenas specific objection should be made to the court or investigating body issuing the subpoena that we should not be required to produce the messages, first, because all telegraphic messages were privileged from subpoena; and, secondly, because subpoenas in this general form were invalid as improper search warrants and fishing excursions; citing Ex parte Brown and Ex parte Gould. The messages were not produced until the objection was noted on the record, and until a specific statement was made that our representative would be held in contempt if he did not comply.

About the time of the prosecution of Albert T. Patrick for the murder of William M. Rice, about 1902, the company, on the recommendation of the law department, changed the practice of making this record objection—and declining compliance until objection was formally overruled. I am referring now to cases in which the telegraph company itself was not the object of investigation, but was merely subpoenaed as a witness in a controversy involving others.

By the way, I may state that it was always merely a record objection—

In such cases, where the period covered by the subpoena necessitated a search involving substantial expense, it has been generally recognized by prosecuting authorities and others that the company should not be expected to make such a search without reimbursement for the expense. This practice has tended to restrict the number of such subpoenas and the length of the search required in each case.

The law department has taken the view that the company itself is in no position to raise the question of the relevancy of the testimony (see Justice McKenna's concurring opinion in Hale v. Henkel, 201 U. S. 43 at p. 81), and that if it is reimbursed for the expense of its search it may not be in a legal position to raise other objections which might be available to its patrons. Wherever a patron has seriously questioned the validity of a subpoena, it has been our practice to withhold compliance for a reasonable time in order to permit him to assert his rights by suing for an injunction.

In Ward v. Western Union (205 A. D. 723), decided in 1923, the customer asserted such objection with success—the objection being that the person issuing the subpoena did not have the subpoena power.

In the case involving Mal Daugherty's messages in 1924, the patron's objection was not only the breadth of the subpoena but also that the Senate had no power to inquire into that particular matter, the Supreme Court not having definitely decided at that time that Congress could issue subpoenas in aid of future legislation. McGrain v. Daugherty (273 U. S. 135) came later. The Fall subpoena, to which you refer, called for the Washington copies of all messages sent by Fall and seven other persons named to any person or received by them from any person during a period of 3 months. It was dated February 28, 1924, and signed by Senator Lenroot, chairman, Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. This subpoena was complied with. It was immediately followed by the Mal Daugherty subpoena, which was contested as above stated—

And to which the Senator from Montana has referred—Will this information be sufficient for your purposes?

That telegram is from the general solicitor of the Western Union Telegraph Co.

Let me now read a few subpoenas.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the Daugherty case, while the petitioners were going to the Supreme Court and tying up the Senate committee hearings, they actually burned the records in the case. In other words, by tying up the case by injunction until they got the Supreme Court decision, they were able to, and did, burn up all the records in the bank, so that the Senate committee never was able to get the information it sought.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, the country knows that the object is to combine burning with injunction, and prevent the Senate and the House from obtaining evidence in cases relating to matters in which they are interested.

Let me read a subpoena issued by the Caraway committee. I will take up a few subpoenas and read them. This subpoena was issued in 1930:

TO THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH CO. AND TO THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.:

Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to appear before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigating lobbying * * * on Friday, March 7, 1930, at 10 o'clock, at their committee room, 212 Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject matters under consideration by said committee, and bring with you all telegraphic communications in your possession or under your control sent by or received by J. W. Worthington, W. G. Waldo, and the Tennessee River Improvement Association.

That subpoena was complied with; but if it had not been complied with all the evidence would not have been obtained, because all the files of the Tennessee Valley Association disappeared. They always disappear in these cases. A strange thing about the history of these investigations is that a minority—and it is a minority—always raise the question that someone's constitutional rights are being invaded; and about that time word goes out that the evidence is gone, anyway.

Last week the Senator from Oregon referred to the fact that the telegrams that were sent by Mr. Bainbridge Colby had been summoned, and that, of course, was terrible, and that somebody might think they had been summoned because he was against the present administration. And yesterday a witness appeared before the committee named Mr. J. A. Arnold. Mr. J. A. Arnold is known to many members of the committee and of the Senate, at least historically speaking, for they will recall the reports made by the Senate Lobby Committee, of which the late Senator Caraway, of Arkansas, was chairman, and in which a very full exposition was made with reference to the activities of Mr. Arnold and the Southern Tariff Association. Mr. Arnold is now an officer of the American Taxpayers' League—I believe that is its title. The same contributors still remember him. He still, he says, goes into the office of Mr. Mellon and obtains his contribution; he still obtains $1,500 contributions from a gentleman in New York whom he knows nothing about but who simply sends him a check for $1,500 in an envelope without any word, without any letter, without any personal contact. He is still engaged in the same type of business in which he was previously engaged. I believe the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Gibson] yesterday, if I am not mistaken, referred to it as "playing the same old game." The evidence disclosed that one of those most actively cooperating with Mr. Arnold in this regard was Mr. Bainbridge Colby, and the evidence further disclosed that every telegram Mr. Arnold had received from Mr. Bainbridge Colby had been destroyed and not a single one was left in his office.

The evidence further showed that Mr. Arnold was subpoenaed day before yesterday, I believe it was, or the day before that, to come before our committee, and that night before last, about 6 or 7 o'clock, he got in communication with Mr. Colby over the long-distance telephone with reference to appearing before the committee. The object of Mr. Arnold's organization is to influence legislation. It was admitted that one of the chief objects appeared to be to change the taxing system so that we might have a sales tax bearing down on the backs of the people of this Nation and to relieve others from income and inheritance taxes. That can easily be understood when we note the contributors to this organization. Here [exhibiting] is the subpoena issued by the Caraway committee.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Is there any difference on earth in that practice and the practice that was invoked, or attempted to be invoked, in another instance here just a year or two ago, in which the Senator from Alabama himself was the principal actor when certain witnesses were brought before the Senate for contempt and were punished, a procedure which was later sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States? While that question was absolutely under the consideration of the Senate at that very moment the interval was being utilized for the purpose of destroying the evidence upon which the procedure was based, and except for some very remarkable reconstruction work by a couple of post office inspectors and a couple of examiners from the committee the very purpose of the action itself would have been defeated by the delay.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, and the subpoena in that case called for all the files. The statement was made that some of them were personal, and they declined to bring them here. During the time the subpoena was out calling for all the files of that law firm, they were destroyed, and the statement was made that they related to personal matters. However, upon being restored to their original form, by putting together the scraps, it developed that they related to air mail and legislation concerning it.

Mr. CLARK. And in that case, as in this, were not the courts resorted to for the purpose of defeating the process of the United States Senate for a sufficiently long extent of time to give them opportunity to destroy the evidence?

Mr. BLACK. The courts were resorted to and the evidence in part was destroyed. Bear in mind, as has been suggested, that the subpoena in that case called for all their telegrams, all their letters, all their files, and the Senate, by an overwhelming vote, followed the course the Senate always has followed, if I am not mistaken—I may be wrong; I have never looked up the record—and if I am not mistaken, by the concurrence of the Senator from Oregon, held there was a violation of the subpoena and sentenced the man for contempt.

Mr. CLARK. And the court upheld the action of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. And the court upheld it.

Now let us see about the Committee on Banking and Currency. It so happened that the Banking and Currency Committee was not called on to summon the telegrams and books of J. P. Morgan and the large business firms they were investigating; they were available, if they could obtain them; but the Senator from Oregon read a case in which it was stated that it would be "terrible", as I recall, to ask for all the messages, all the books and all the papers, and all the accounts of any firm or individual. Here is one of the many subpoenas issued by the very committee of which he is a member and which he stated on the floor of the Senate a few days ago had issued no general subpoenas. I have numerous subpoenas issued by that committee. Listen to this subpoena issued to an individual by the name of Robert O. Lord. There is a whole page designating the very things they want, and then—

Also all books, records, agreements, correspondence, and documents of the Guardian Detroit Union Group, Inc., or any of its units, in your possession.

There is no distinction there between the letters which did not refer to the facts in which they were interested and those which did. They did not scrupulously say, "We want you to pick out the telegrams that you think would be admissible, in order that we, the Senate committee, may have them", but they asked them to bring all of the group.

Here is another to Mr. Landon K. Thorne, president of Bonbright & Co., Inc., a very large company:

And you, the said Landon K. Thorne, bring with you any and all stock records showing daily position in United Corporation rights and common, preferred stock for period from January 2, 1929, to December 31, 1931; ledger accounts of J. P. Morgan & Co.; and all joint accounts in which J. P. Morgan & Co., Guaranty Co., and Asiel & Co. were partners; and any and all written contracts, and/or agreements entered into between any of the following from January 2, 1929, to December 31, 1931—Asiel & Co., J. P. Morgan & Co., and Guaranty Co., pertaining to transactions in the securities of United Corporation—and all ledgers, correspondence, relative to said United Corporation and affiliate dealings.

And, that not being broad enough, the subpoena further called for—

For a period of years. The subpoena was not limited to the papers relating to the transactions, they specifically set out, but after they had put them in specifically, in order to get them all, they threw their blanket out and said, "Bring all of them in." I do not say that in any spirit of criticism. I say it with a realization of the fact that they were compelled to issue that kind of a subpoena if they were to get the things that were essential to the investigation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree that the reason for the broadness of that subpoena, and the reason for the broadness of so many other subpoenas issued by Senate investigating committees, is the recognition on the part of the man who drew the subpoena, and of the committee which issued it, that a Senate committee, as the representative of the sovereign—which in this country is the people of the United States—is not to be held to the same rule of particularity in specifying documents to be brought in by process to which private litigants must necessarily be held.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. That has been held since the very beginning of the history of this country. I might state, however, that I intend to read into the RECORD a little later an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States giving a grand jury the right to issue a subpoena in all respects as broad as this.

Now, here is another one issued by the Banking and Currency Committee, of which the Senator from Oregon is a member, and he said on the floor that he took part in the investigation, and the committee were very careful to see that all the subpoenas were very limited and specific in their nature.

To Mr. Oscar L. Cox—

Here is the subpoena—

* * * then and there to testify, * * * and have you there and then and ready to produce before the committee all books, records, documents, agreements, and correspondence of the United Trust Co.

I do not know certainly, but I imagine that was a very big order.

The subpoena did not specify a period of years; it was not limited, as ours was limited to a period of time when the Members of the Senate and the House were being flooded with faked and forged telegrams, the evidence of which was carefully burned and destroyed all over this Nation. The subpoena of the Banking and Currency Committee did not limit the time. They simply said to bring all correspondence, telegraphic and otherwise, and it was brought; the subpoena was obeyed. Senators may be sure if the attorneys for Mr. Morgan and the groups which were investigated by the Banking and Currency Committee had believed it possible to avoid obeying the subpoenas, they had money enough to hire lawyers adequate to do the job.

You, the said Harley L. Clarke, bring with you, etc., all journals, ledgers, cashbooks, checkbooks, and other books of account in which your personal financial transactions during the period January 1, 1925, to July 31, 1933, were recorded.

This subpoena was issued by the committee of which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] said he was a member in an investigation in which he said he participated, and calls for all the books, letters, correspondence, memoranda, and all the checkbooks, ledgers, cashbooks, and journals of and concerning the personal financial transactions of this man for a period of 8 years. Is it to be supposed that during a period of 8 years a man would never have any personal financial transactions in which his wife might have drawn a check or some of the sweethearts, about whom great anxiety has been expressed, might have been involved?

But the Senator from Oregon at that time was not worrying about the personal transactions of Mr. Harley L. Clarke, because the Senator, by his statement on this floor, approved the subpoenas issued by that committee of which he was a member, and that committee told Mr. Harley L. Clarke to dig back for 8 years and bring to a Senate committee every memorandum that he had relating not only to his public financial transactions but his personal financial transactions.

That was not all. They were not satisfied with that. They thought perhaps he had had some correspondence either by telegram or otherwise, so they called upon him to bring—

All correspondence by and between the aforesaid parties and the Chase Securities Corporation; Chase National Bank; Pyncheon & Co.; General Theaters Equipment, Inc.; International Projector Corporation; National Theaters Supply Co.; William Fox; Fox Film Corporation; Fox Theaters Corporation; Sherman Corporation; Albert H. Wiggin; and Murray W. Dodge—with whom he had supposedly had telegraphic or written correspondence during that period. They did not limit it. They did not say, "We want that which you think is admissible." They did not suggest that they desired that he pick out all the private correspondence between him and the parties named. Of course they did not. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who was chairman of that committee, and Mr. Pecora, who was aiding in the investigation, both knew that if the investigation was to bring out the facts they would have to ask for the facts. I shall read a little later from a statement by the distinguished former Senator from Missouri, Mr. Reed, that such investigating committees know that they ought not to go to the parties being investigated, hats in hand, and say, "Please give us what you think we ought to have."

Let us see some other subpoenas. My statement has been challenged. Here is one issued by the Munitions Committee. I have a dozen of them here. Listen to this one, addressed to James E. Barnes:

You, the said James E. Barnes, bring with you all records, data, correspondence, memoranda, etc., relating to the activities of shipbuilders during the period 1916-35, inclusive.

Of course, some of that correspondence did not relate to anything the committee wanted to investigate, but they knew that if they obtained the truth, it was necessary to follow the custom which has been observed from the beginning of the history of this country, and they did so.

I have quite a number of similar subpoenas here on my desk calling for correspondence, for instance, from 1915 to 1934, another one for correspondence from 1930 to 1934, and others calling for the same types of records.

Let us see what kind of subpoena was issued in connection with the investigation in the Teapot Dome controversy. The statement has been made and heralded abroad that no committee of which former Senator Walsh, of Montana, was connected would go beyond its legal rights, for he was a man, I may say parenthetically, whose name is synonymous with reverence for and loyalty to the Constitution, a man who acted within the law, but who recognized how far he could go within the law and the Constitution in order to expose crookedness and corruption. Let me read this subpoena signed by the chairman of the committee of which former Senator Walsh, of Montana, was one of the most active members:

R. S. Burns, Western Union telegraph operator, Three Rivers, N. Mex.

You are hereby commanded to appear . . . and bring with you any and all incoming or outgoing telegrams from the office of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at Three Rivers, N. Mex., in your possession or under your control, from July 1 to December 31, 1921, July 1 to December 31, 1922, and January 1 to December 31, 1923, inclusive.

What did that subpoena call for? It called for every telegram sent by every person and received by every person at Three Rivers, N. Mex., for a period of 3 years.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. As I heard the Senator read the subpoena, it would undoubtedly be broad enough to call for telegrams of a purely personal nature which might have passed between the late Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Fall, and his wife or other members of the family.

Mr. BLACK. Of course it did.

Mr. CLARK. Therefore the committee, headed by as great a lawyer as the late Senator Walsh, of Montana, deliberately recognized that in the case of an investigation by a committee representing the sovereign people, the committee were entitled not only to be able to secure pertinent information, but to be able to secure some information which might not be particularly relevant to the investigation. That is the charge made against the committee headed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct. There was nothing strange about that, because other subpoenas were issued commanding the production from other places of all telegrams to and from former Secretary Fall and to and from the wife of former Secretary Fall, which necessarily included all the telegrams between themselves in any capacity, private or otherwise. I have the subpoena before me. It is dated the 6th day of March 1924. The other one was 1928, but there was ample precedent under which the former Senator from Montana and the other Senators could act. Away back in 1876 telegrams had been summoned to and from certain towns in the State of Oregon with reference to an election in that State, and all the way down the line since that time that custom has been observed.

Let us see what they did in connection with the Teapot Dome telegrams. I had passed that over, but I shall return presently to the other branch of this controversy in which, as I recall, the distinguished Senator who sits at my right [Mr. ASHURST], who is chairman of the Judiciary Committee, took part, and of which committee former Senator Brookhart, of Iowa, was chairman. Let me read the subpoena since I have referred to it, issued back in 1924. It is addressed to the manager of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at Washington, D. C., and he was directed—

To bring with you all messages to or from Mrs. Albert B. Fall, Mrs. J. W. Zevely at Palm Beach, Fla., or New Orleans, La., from December 1923 to March 6, 1924.

Is there anything offensive about that subpoena? Did they permit the parties in the Teapot Dome investigation to do that which they would like to do? Did they say to them, "Bring before us those telegrams which you think are admissible?" What would they have obtained? What about those telegrams which referred to "peaches" when they did not mean "peaches"? What about the other telegrams which were referred to by the Senator from Arizona in his magnificent address in connection with the Fall investigation, where Fall sent out telegram after telegram which on its face was perfectly harmless, but when read in connection with other evidence was shown to contain information which was vital in the effort in order to uncover the crookedness of that crowd?

There are two subpoenas. I could produce others in 1928, of a general nature, calling for all the telegrams in the town, whether they were from wives, sweethearts, or anyone else; but it was necessary to couch them in such terms in order to uncover the situation when it was known that these men always concealed their tracks, and, if necessary, would use assumed names. It was necessary and essential, in order to obtain the truth, to issue subpoenas which called for the information.

Has anyone ever heard that in response to any of those subpoenas any private telegrams were revealed? Certainly not. Has anyone ever heard that in 1876, when all the telegrams were subpoenaed from certain cities in Louisiana, and some of them down in my own State of Alabama, and some of them from the State of Oregon, private telegrams were revealed? No one has. They were obtained, but the committee was not interested in the purely private messages. The committee was interested, as is the committee now serving this body, in the messages which related to the business which the committee was charged with performing.

Let us see about some of the other subpoenas.

Here is one issued by the Judiciary Committee of the House on the 3d day of September 1932. Certainly the Judiciary Committee of the House has members who are lawyers, who are an honor to the profession of the law. It has as its chairman Representative HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas, a man whose ability and whose loyalty to the best traditions of the Nation are well recognized by all who have come in contact with him. Here is a subpoena issued by the Judiciary Committee of the House to Guy H. Gilbert, 1600 California Street, San Francisco, Calif.

Let me read simply the closing part of the subpoena. I have it before me for those who desire to read it all. It calls for information during the years 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, and says:

Also produce his personal bank accounts during the same period, and canceled checks, check stubs, savings passbooks, and all documents in his possession which further support disbursements from his personal accounts.

Why was that subpoena issued? It was issued because it was realized that in order to obtain the truth it was necessary to call for the personal accounts of these individuals. They could always call the accounts personal, whether or not they were actually personal. The only way to obtain the truth was to issue subpoenas exactly as the House committee did in that instance, exactly as committees of the House and the Senate have done since the very beginning of their history, with a realization of the fact that there are some persons who conceal their tracks in such manner that it is necessary that the subpoena be broad and require the bringing in of all letters, papers, and correspondence which might by any possibility be relevant to the issue. The committees do not expose personal information. It has never been done during the entire history of the Government, although House and Senate committees have exercised that authority since the beginning of our history.

Let me read another subpoena issued in 1932 by the House Committee on the Judiciary:

Have with him and there produce bank statements, canceled checks, savings-bank passbooks, and such other evidentiary matter that he may have covering his personal bank accounts and deposits and disbursements therefrom during the years 1930, 1931, and the year 1932 to date.

I have numerous other subpoenas along the same lines, but these are sufficient to show the kind of subpoenas issued by the committees.

Now, let me read you some more Teapot Dome subpoenas.

The subpoena I have in my hand, I note, is signed by one who perhaps the Senator from Oregon would not claim would be anxiously on the alert to violate any principle of the Constitution relating to either human or property rights. It is signed by Hon. Reed Smoot, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. This subpoena, I may state, was issued to a newspaper reporter who evidently had certain information that the committee wanted. It had been obtained, it was said, in a very confidential manner, and the claim was made that it should not be produced in the Senate.

Here is the subpoena:

And testify what you may know relative to the subject matter under consideration by said committee; and bring with you all papers in your possession, or under your control, or obtainable by you, touching the leasing of Naval Reserve No. 3, or any matters relative to the same, or any inducement thereto.

In other words, this was a reporter who claimed that the information had been obtained in a confidential manner.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to state to the Senator that this information was obtained by a reporter acting under the direction of his publisher for and on behalf of his newspaper making an investigation for the newspaper.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the Senator.

Now let me read some more subpoenas in the Teapot Dome matter. I will read just the part of the subpoena which tells the person what to bring. Listen to this one:

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH Co.:

* * * bring with you copies of all telegrams sent by any person from the city of Washington to either Albert B. Fall, or Edward B. McLean—

Who, by the way, was connected with a newspaper, the Washington Post—or J. W. Zevely, at Palm Beach, Fla., between December 20, 1923, and January 30, 1924; and copies of all telegrams sent by any person to Edward L. Doheny, or J. W. Zevely, or Albert B. Fall, at New Orleans, La., between December 20, 1923, and January 30, 1924, and copies of all telegrams sent by Albert B. Fall, or Edward B. McLean, or Edward L. Doheny, or J. W. Zevely to any person, from December 20, 1923, to January 30, 1924.

Is there anything specific about that subpoena? It even related to a newspaper publisher; and now a complaint has been filed in the courts which asserts that newspaper publishers—I am almost quoting the exact words—are not subject to any investigation by Senate or House.

When the committee investigated this newspaper publisher, they obtained these telegrams:

JANUARY 5, 1924.

EDWARD B. MCLEAN,
Palm Beach, Fla.:

Congratulations upon decision, which is result of Lambert's skillful work. Case could not have been handled better. Regards.
ED BENNETT.

JANUARY 9, 1924.

EDWARD B. MCLEAN:

Committee authorized Walsh to go for deposition and to make arrangements with me. Am awaiting conference with him now.

WILTON LAMBERT.

The committee could not have obtained those telegrams under the rules by which it is now sought to hamstring and curtail the rights of Senate committees. Of course, there are many who would like to prevent committees exposing corruption and crookedness. There always have been such persons. In every investigation that has ever occurred, the same old line of thought has come up; and those who have no regard for the Constitution or the law, moral or otherwise, have been the first to try to drape themselves in the Constitution and the American flag.

I have here, and shall read a little later, some of the other telegrams which came in response to those subpoenas. They are very interesting. I think I shall put two or three of them in the RECORD at the present time.

Mr. President, I shall now read some of the telegrams which came in response to this subpoena. Here is one dated January 9:

Jaguar baptistical stowage beadle 1235 Huff Pulsator commensal fiffil Lambert conation fecund-hybridize

Can one imagine a committee being able to designate that telegram so that it could be obtained? Here is another one:

Just talked with Apricots and believe he has the thing well in hand. He advises not to talk about peaches or Apples with anyone. He says Apples and Cherries assured him you need not worry. The peaches will be just what you want.

Under the rule which it is suggested a committee should follow in order to obtain telegraphic messages, of course, it is known that when a man wanted to conceal his course by telegram all it would be necessary for him to do would be to name somebody "Apricots" and somebody else "Peaches" and somebody else "Apples", and he would successfully conceal his activities from any Senate or House committee. There would be absolutely no way to obtain the message.

A telegraph company cannot look at messages and determine what are admissible in a certain case, and they recognize that fact. It may be that a message which seems to be wholly and completely removed from the question in controversy has the closest connection with it and is absolutely essential in order to establish the point which the committee desires to establish.

On having these messages decoded, it was discovered that every one of them related to something which the committee was investigating.

I have before me another subpoena, issued in the Teapot Dome case, issued on the 25th of February 1924, signed by Senator Ladd, and reading:

Bring with you copies of all telegrams in your possession or under your control sent by William O. Duckstein or W. F. Wiley to any person, or received by William O. Duckstein or W. F. Wiley from any person, from December 1, 1923, to February 25, 1924.

Here is another one:

And bring with you copies of all telegrams in your possession or under your control sent by any person to either Albert B. Fall, Edward B. McLean, J. W. Zevely, Edward L. Doheny, Harry F. Sinclair, William O. Duckstein, W. F. Wiley, or John Major between December 1, 1923, and February 28, 1924, or sent by any of these persons to any person between December 1, 1923, and February 28, 1924.

Here is another one:

Bring with you all messages in your possession or under your control to or from Albert B. Fall, R. W. Stewart, Harry F. Sinclair, J. W. Zevely, Edward B. McLean, Edward L. Doheny, or H. M. Blackmer from January 1, 1921, to March 1, 1924.

I have numerous other subpoenas of exactly the same type. So that, so far as that committee was concerned, there is no sort of doubt that it was their uniform custom, and I might add a custom which was in keeping with the settled traditions of the House and the Senate, to issue subpoenas of that type in order to obtain the information they desired.

Let me read two or three lines to show what was said about Senators who were endeavoring to obtain the truth at that time. I shall not quote from the speeches on the floor of the Senate, but many will recall that Senators were very seriously attacked from the floor. Let me read a portion of an editorial appearing in the New York Times on April 29, 1924, the title of which is "Searching for Political Oil." The editorial stated:

Senator Walsh seems obsessed by the belief that the oil scandal dates back to the Republican national convention of 1920.

At another place the editorial reads:

In his speech in the Senate the other day, replying to critics of the investigation, Senator Walsh admitted that a great deal of uncorroborated hearsay and incredible testimony had been presented to the Senate committee. But he protested that only by such methods could the residuum of truth be got at. There could not be a strict adherence to the rules of evidence. Shady characters must be allowed to say what they had heard or invented. There is force in this contention, and congressional investigators must be allowed a great deal of latitude. But the limit is certainly reached when such a second-hand story is admitted as the one of yesterday, telling about Senator Penrose telephoning General Wood—

And so forth.

There may have been political corruption, actual or attempted, in the Republican campaign of 1920. Some of the men mentioned were capable of it. But neither they nor any politicians that ever lived were capable of such melodramatic proceedings as those which were retailed to the Senate committee yesterday.

Let us see what the New York Herald Tribune said about the matter at that time.

Seriousness is of the essence of good clowning, and Senator WHEELER, by taking his absurd and incredible witnesses seriously, has added the immortal touch to the scene. The Daugherty investigation is the official name of the business. But the evidence, such as it is, has never got within miles of its destination. A district attorney would not give it office room. What one witness of no credibility heard another witness of no credibility say has brought Senator WHEELER up standing with a triumphant "Aha!"—amid the laughter of the public.

If Senator Walsh succeeded in proving for all time how unfair a Senator of the United States could be, Senator WHEELER has at least surpassed him in demonstrating how ridiculous a Senator of the United States can be.

So that it will be seen that there is nothing new or unusual in attacking a committee.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. While the Senator is on the subject of the Teapot Dome investigation, I call the attention of the Senate to the attack which has been made in the newspapers and over the radio and even upon the floor of the Senate against the present committee for the alleged use of the Federal Communications Commission. The answer of the Commission yesterday to the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] completely refuted any of the arguments which have been made. But I think in considering this particular question it might be well to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that in the Teapot Dome investigation under Senator Walsh of Montana, the Federal Trade Commission was used in the examination of a large number of corporations doing business in Washington, D. C., and New York City. Lewis F. Bond, of the Federal Trade Commission, made the investigation at the request and for the benefit of the committee. Further, William Frederick Friedman, the Chief of the Code Section of the Signal Office of the War Department, was used by the committee for the purpose of decoding the messages which the Senator from Alabama has just read. So, despite the fact that our committee have not made any use of the Communications Commission, there is this very definite precedent upon the part of the Teapot Dome Committee in its investigation of the use of other branches of the Government.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. Now let me read one of the many subpoenas issued by the special committee appointed under Senate Resolution 195, of which the distinguished former Senator from Missouri, James A. Reed, was chairman. I read from a part of the subpoena:

You are further commanded to bring with you and produce before said committee all books of account and all bank checks, bank drafts, or other instruments showing the receipt or distribution of moneys which may be under or subject to your control.

That was a very general subpoena. It continued:

And all memoranda in writing, including all letters by you received and copies of all letters by you sent.

Evidently the committee, not believing that to be sufficient, added as an additional clause:

And all and every instrument in writing which is calculated to or may throw light upon any of the above-named matters concerning which you are as above stated required to testify.

Let me read what the Senator from Missouri said about that time in connection with how to conduct an investigation:

Mr. REED (Democrat) of Missouri. The regrettable thing is that there has been a consistent and determined effort to prevent the taking and preserving of evidence. It is absolutely useless to deny the fact that almost every device conceivable has been employed to prevent the taking and preserving of this evidence. When a man seeks a seat in this body through his attorneys, through his representatives undertaking to prevent such an investigation and such a preservation of evidence, he places himself in a very unenviable position. He, in fact, challenges the honesty and integrity of the body of Senators who will gather the evidence, or he confesses his fear of an honest investigation. I have had some experience in the courts, and it is very seldom that I have ever seen an honest man with a good case refuse to have evidence taken and refuse to allow the full light to be turned in upon the situation. * * * The fact that Mr. Newberry sends his attorneys here to prevent the taking of testimony is very significant. It is utterly useless to hide behind the old dodge that every lawyer has worked, saying, "Put your finger on the paper you want, and we will perhaps produce that paper. Tell us the particular set of books you want investigated, and we will perhaps produce the books." Every man who has tried lawsuits knows that in cases like this, that in all cases where fraud is charged, or where there are any ramifications of corruption charged, you have to start perhaps with a small fact, and tracing that fact through its various connections to develop other facts, and finally you are able to expose the whole warp and woof of an enormous fraud and a widespread conspiracy.

It is the only way cases of this kind can be developed. If all the evidence was known in advance nobody would need an investigation.

Said the Senator from Missouri:

The thing that would be done, if this investigation was allowed to proceed, is this: The members of the committee who conducted the campaign of Mr. Newberry * * * would be put under oath. They would be put on the witness stand; they would be inquired of as to their organization and the membership of it; they would be asked to produce their books of account; they would be asked in what bank they kept their money; they would be asked who were their agents in various counties and various precincts. Having produced that sort of a brief and acquired that sort of knowledge, the investigation would proceed to the banks, to the check books, to the agents, to the correspondence, to all the letters and everything that had passed between them; and when you got through you would know something about it.

Now, for an attorney to stand around on his hind legs and say, "Tell us in advance what we have been doing", when everything has been done in secret, is simply for that attorney to certify to the people and to the country and to everybody else who knows the facts that he wants concealment.

I have just read to the Senate the words spoken by James A. Reed, who was a Senator from Missouri at the time he made that statement, and who at that time was interested in bringing about the truth in investigations with which he was connected.

I have a large number of other subpoenas issued by former Senator Reed, but they contain the same general clause which I read with reference to the books and papers.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to inquire if that is the same Senator James A. Reed, of Missouri, who, a few days ago, in New York City, gave out an interview condemning this committee, and said:

That seizure is the high point among the infamies of the New Deal. It is so contemptible a thing as naturally to suggest its author. It is so un-American a thing as naturally to carry us back to the days of the Inquisition.

Is the man who made that statement the same man who made the statement from which the Senator has just been reading?

Mr. BLACK. It is my understanding that former Senator James A. Reed is the one who made the statement quoted from the newspaper; and he is the one who made the speech on the Senate floor from which I read, and who issued the subpoenas I have just read.

I have before me a complete history of the subpoenas issued by this body. I shall not, of course, refer to all of them. It would take entirely too long a time to do so. I have this statement here, however, for the perusal of any Senators who are interested in it. If Senators will read it, they will see there is nothing whatever extraordinary in the type of subpoenas which have been issued by the special Senate committee; and there is nothing new in the argument which has been made against the issuance of the subpoena.

I am going to read the argument which was made in reference to a similar subpoena in 1876, at the time when the subpoena was ordered to be obeyed, and was obeyed. Listen to this argument. It sounds very much like some which have been made recently on the floor of the Senate and over the radio:

And in behalf of that profession, and in behalf of the whole community, I proclaim this seizure of telegrams—

Senators will recall that this argument was made in 1876—

this wholesale seizure without any specification whatever, is an outrage upon private life and liberty, the like of which has never been known in any county whatever in a time of peace, and which would never be submitted to under any despotism in Europe without outcry and rebellion, almost, if attempted in the form in which it is attempted here; and the only wonder to me in this case is—that in the freedom with which the telegraph has been used by all parties, more or less, relating to the most intimate commercial and business affairs as well as to affairs of social life, involving property, honor, character, and the most sacred domestic relations, they have not been able to disclose more facts than have been exhibited here.

I could read the Senate numbers of other statements. They called attention to the fact that in this so-called wholesale seizure of telegrams in 1876 they might have read a telegram from a man to his wife, or from the wife to the man. I do not know of any and I really have not heard of any wives who have protested that their telegrams have been exposed. As a matter of fact, they did not protest at that time, in 1876.

Let me read to the Senate what was said in reply to these suggestions. When the argument was completed, it was decided that the telegrams should be brought in. A citation was issued for contempt, and the telegrams were secured. This occurred in 1876:

Your committee has been attacked because of what has been claimed to be a wholesale seizure of telegrams. Sir, no wholesale seizure of telegrams has been made. We have done this, which is, in my judgment, exactly according to the law of the land, exactly within the power of this House—

I may state that this is a distinguished Republican from whom I am reading—exactly within the power of any court of justice; we sent our subpoena duces tecum to the telegraph offices, asked them to bring their dispatches, and asked the managers of the offices, either at our rooms or at home, to select certain telegrams of parties named or unnamed, as well as we could designate them.

The reason why we had to go pretty broadly in our selection was that corrupt rascals engaged in this nefarious business used all manner of feigned names: "Hooker", "Bismarck, Jr.", "Prescott", "Potter", etc. "Hooker" means sometimes "Woolley"; "Bismarck, Jr." sometimes means "Woolley"; "Prescott" means "Sam Ward"; and "O" means "Sam Ward"; "Potter" means "McCulloch." And there were a dozen other aliases, ciphers, which we had to investigate.

And allow me to say—

Said this Republican Representative at that time—

it was not necessary so to do—but if it had been necessary, in my judgment, it was the right, nay, it was the duty of the House of Representatives—to take in every telegram in every office in the country and examine it for the purposes of justice, and of that no honest man would complain. There is a couplet of my namesake, Anthony of Hudibras, I believe, applicable here:

"No rogue e'er felt the halter draw
With good opinion of the law."

And that principle applies today as well as it did in 1876. Of course, those who have been engaged in practices of which they are ashamed, and which they do not wish to reveal to the public, do not have a good opinion of those who would expose their nefarious practices. They never have, and they never will.

I read a little further—and this was in 1876—

Therefore, when we struck these telegrams there was a great fluttering—

There is a great fluttering at the present time. I may say there was a great fluttering on the part of one individual who, a number of years ago, took private telegrams and turned them over to President Theodore Roosevelt in order to expose lobbyists, he said, and then later took the credit throughout the Nation of having delivered to President Theodore Roosevelt the telegrams in which the lobbying was exposed. I shall have those papers here at a later date for the use of those who desire to see them.

Therefore when we struck these telegrams there was a great fluttering. Among whom? Among the gold gamblers—

They were the ones they were after then—among the whisky gamblers; among the corrupt confederates who admit that they met and consulted how Senators' votes could be bought—

Remember, this was in 1876—

No honest, true man complains or fears the investigation.

I call attention to the fact that I have before me the very lengthy debate at that time on both sides of the controversy. It was with reference to telegraphic subpoenas which called for telegrams passing to and from individuals, and telegrams to and from certain towns in this country. The result was that the House held they had the right to obtain the telegrams; and they obtained the telegrams, as they have done every time the controversy has ever come up.

Let me read to the Senate a statement which appeared in an argument in the case of Kilbourn on April 15, 1876. This is what said said:

The power to examine witnesses before committees is so transcendently important that it goes far beyond the power of the courts—

And I may state that the argument made by this gentleman in the House was adopted as a part of a resolution which was adopted by the House; not the exact language, but the substance of it—

In the courts a witness cannot be compelled to give evidence that may criminate himself, and he is made the judge to decide if it will. But before a committee of Congress he has no such exemption.

Since that statement was made, the House and the Senate have passed a bill which was approved by the President, which recognizes that a man who is compelled to testify before a Senate committee or a House committee will not be prosecuted for that offense; but that privilege was recognized by congressional enactment. Up to that time it had not been recognized in the general proceedings.

Further he said:

Before a committee of Congress even counsel can be compelled to disclose confidential communications of clients.

Here the maxim applies: Salus populi suprema lex.

But it may be said this power of the House is liable to abuse, and there should be some protection for the rights of a citizen. The power is liable to abuse. So is all power. If the courts were all infallible—

And it may be that some think they are, I say parenthetically—

If the courts were all infallible, and if Congress could afford the delay of appealing to them, the objection would have great weight. But if such a power existed in the courts, it would also be liable to abuse. The courts could then abuse their powers to the great detriment of the public interests. In time of war and other great emergencies and in the closing hours of a Congress such a power in the courts will be liable to great danger of abuse. It is much more likely that injury would result to all the people from tolerating judicial supervision over the exercise of legislative powers than that individuals would suffer from any wrong imprisonment by the House. No great hardship can result, because the witness will always have it in his power to relieve himself by testifying. And this can rarely ever result in any great evil, while really great evils may result if a judicial court could put an end to investigations by the House.

"Investigating committees" are among the approved and useful agencies for exposing frauds, for providing the means of legislating against them, and for ascertaining what officers deserve impeachment. If we shall now say that all these useful agencies may be arrested by a single judge, we must assume that he combines in himself a wisdom that cannot err, a purity that cannot be bribed or corrupted, while a majority of 292 Members of this House is a less safe repository of human rights and public interests than one single judge. If that be so, it is high time the House was disbanded and abolished.

That was a statement made on the floor of the House in 1876.

I shall not read the various decisions that have been made; but, if any Senators are peculiarly interested in them, I shall be glad to furnish them.

The statement was made that there was some confusion about the subpoena and the order of the subpoena in 1876. Let me read from the subpoena. I have it before me. There is no confusion about what it means according to my understanding.

JOHN THOMPSON, Esq.,

Sergeant at Arms, or His Special Messenger:

You are hereby commanded to summon E. W. Barnes, of the Western Union Telegraph Co. at New Orleans, to be and appear before the Louisiana Affairs Special Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which William R. Morrison is chairman, and with all telegrams sent or received by William Pitt Kellogg and [here are given the names of seven others], at the office of the Western Union Telegraph Co., New Orleans, from and after the 15th day of August 1876, in their chamber in the city of New Orleans at the St. Charles Hotel, and forthwith then and there to testify concerning matters of inquiry committed to said committee.

I have before me the evidence of Mr. Barnes in which he declined to obey that summons. The telegraph company at that early date took the position that the subpoena was too general. They have long since abandoned that position, however, because they found that it could not be sustained either in the courts or in the Senate and the House.

Here is the resolution:

Resolved, That for the efficient prosecution of the inquiry ordered by the House the chairman of the committee communicate to the House for its consideration the refusal of E. W. Barnes to produce before the committee the telegrams referred to in the subpoena upon him December 13, 1876, his refusal being in contempt of the House of Representatives.

A minority did argue against the subpoena. The Senator from Oregon read from speeches made by the minority in that case, one of whom was Mr. Garfield.

Now, let us see just what they held. Here is the closing clause of the resolution:

Resolved, That if said Barnes shall answer that he is now willing to produce said telegrams to said committee, and promises to do so, that he be allowed to do so without unnecessary delay, and upon so doing he shall be discharged from custody.

And yet the statement was made that there was some confusion. There might have been confusion in the mind of Mr. Barnes. He was in jail, where he went because he declined to obey the general subpoena of the House, and he stayed there until he agreed to produce the telegrams, and then he was released from custody. I have the entire record of the case before me.

Mr. President, that, however, was not the only instance. I desire to read one other subpoena calling for the production of telegrams:

On the 19th instant Mr. Morton, chairman of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, caused a subpoena to be issued for President Orton directing him to appear before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and bring with him copies of all telegraphic dispatches received at or sent from the telegraph offices in Salem and Portland, State of Oregon, from the 1st day of November 1876 to the 19th day of December 1876, any and all dispatches containing the name of J. N. P. Patrick or J. N. P. Partrick, also Charles Diamond or Charles Dimond, also Runyon & Co., also Ladd & Bush, also Eugene Casserly, also William M. Gwinn or to said Gwinn or from him, and all dispatches where the sum of $8,000 is mentioned, and all dispatches of a political character by whomsoever sent or received referring to the electoral vote of Oregon, the ineligibility of Watts as Presidential elector, or to giving the certificate to Cronin as a Presidential elector, and also all dispatches of a political character by whomsoever sent or received within the period named herein.

So here we find that they first asked for all the telegrams and then asked for all the others they could think of sent by persons whose names they knew.

I may add that what I have just read is to be found in the Washington Evening Star of date, I believe, December 26, 1876.

Mr. President, I shall not go further into the subpoenas, because I have shown by the subpoenas themselves—and I could cite many more; I have them here for the inspection of those Senators who may desire to see them—that it has been the uniform rule of this body, as it has been the uniform rule of the House of Representatives, a rule which involves a right which has never been surrendered in any instance, to have investigating committees summon all telegrams that it believes to be admissible, and has adopted the single principal, which has been followed from the beginning, that the subpoena must be sufficiently definite to notify the person subpoenaed of the papers desired to be produced. That does not mean that all of them are used in evidence; they are not; but the bodies have never taken the viewpoint that either a telegraph company or the person involved can be permitted to pick out the telegrams he wants the committee to have.

I heard a few days ago of a telegram that came into Washington which related to "apricots", and it developed when the subpoena was issued for it, or issued for all telegrams (which was the only way it could be obtained in connection with a certain investigation), that "apricots" referred to a stock on the market which was then under investigation. When it was desired to conceal the facts contained in the telegram by using the word "apricots", instead of the word "stock", how would it be possible to obtain the evidence from telegraphic companies after the telegrams had been burned and destroyed all over the Nation if the committee were compelled to ask only for those telegrams the telegraph companies think would be relevant and pertinent?

The telegraph company is not competent to pass upon their relevancy and their pertinency. The committee can do so. They do that as the courts that summon various papers can determine whether or not they are admissible and relevant to the inquiry under way.

Now, I desire to read from a subpoena issued by a grand jury which was not with reference to telegrams, but it is in almost identical language the same. My attention is called to the fact that it does mention telegrams, but it was issued to the person to whom they were sent and by whom they were received instead of to the telegraph company. I will first read from the syllabus:

An officer of a corporation is not subjected to an unreasonable search or seizure by a subpoena to produce without ad testificandum clause the books and papers of that corporation, nor is he subjected to self-incrimination by such subpoena and an order to produce thereunder or deprived of his liberty without due process of law by being committed for contempt for failure to comply with such order (Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361).

The subpoena to which I now refer on page 483 of volume 226, United States Reports, in the case of Wheeler against the United States. The subpoena called for the following information:

All cashbooks, ledgers, journals, and other books of account of said Wheeler & Shaw, Inc., for and covering the period between October 1, 1909, and January 1, 1911—

Two years—

All copies of letters and telegrams of Wheeler & Shaw, Inc., signed or purporting to be signed by said Wheeler & Shaw, Inc., or by its president or its treasurer in behalf of said Wheeler & Shaw, Inc., during the months of October, November, and December, 1909, and the entire year of 1910; all the aforesaid books, copies of letters, and telegrams to be produced before the grand jurors of said district court in the matter of an alleged violation of the laws of the United States by Warren B. Wheeler and Stillman Shaw.

That subpoena was not limited. It was all-inclusive. Every letter, every telegram, every book entry, every ledger entry, was called for by the subpoena issued by the grand jury. Mr. Justice Day, in passing upon the subpoena, said:

There is nothing to show it was so broad as to be objectionable as was indicated of the subpoena in Hale v. Henkel (201 U. S. p. 43).

That is the case from which the Senator from Oregon read. In other words, not only do we have the uniform practice and custom of both Houses at the Capitol, charged with the constitutional function of obtaining information for legislation, but I have produced here an opinion by the Supreme Court of the United States itself which holds there was nothing wrong with the form of subpoena which called for every letter, every telegram, every memorandum, and every book entry covering a period of 2 years, and this was to be used by a grand jury with a limited issue before it. It is the duty of the Senate and the House to legislate on all subjects.

Someone has said we would summon lawyers' telegrams and would summon telegrams from newspapers. Are they segregated from the great mass of citizenship of the Nation? Is it true that they have peculiar caste and privilege by reason of the fact that one belongs to the legal profession and the other belongs to the newspaper profession? It is true that lawyers have certain privileges with reference to giving testimony before the courts. That privilege has never been recognized as a matter of right in either body at the Capitol. It is a matter of discretion for the committees to determine.

This country believes in the principle of a free press, and most of its people probably agree with Thomas Jefferson in the statement he made, that if he had to choose between a free government and the free press he would choose a free press, because a free press would bring about a free government. Is it true, because of that belief on the part of the people, that those who engage in that business, so vital and necessary to the peace and happiness of the people of America, are somehow placed far above the law upon a pinnacle so high that they, like the kings in the feudal kingdoms of old, can do no wrong? Yet it is asserted in a judicial proceeding that neither the House nor the Senate has a right to make any investigation of the press.

Mr. President, I yield to no one in my loyalty to the principle announced by Thomas Jefferson with reference to freedom of the press. It has been found in every part of the history of the world that a free press is an asset to free government. Of course, it is true that that tradition sprang up in the minds of men and women at a time when the press was dependent in the main for its income upon those who bought its papers and not upon those who bought its advertising.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine I heard someone announce a few days ago that the press of the United States is today a byproduct of advertising; but I regret to say that every person who believes in freedom of the press is bound to view with somewhat fearful apprehension the dreadful power given to those who can stifle the press by declining to give it advertising, and who can give it prosperity by placing their advertisements upon its pages. But notwithstanding that fact, it is absolutely essential that the people of the United States shall perpetuate a free press. I do not mean the kind of free press prated about by those who believe in a free press for revenue only and who go around the United States talking about a free press at so much per speech. In my judgment, the greatest enemy of a free press which exists in America, today is not any man in political life, not any man who walks the streets as a citizen of this Republic and who loves his Nation and his flag, but the greatest enemy of a free press in America is the man who is willing to subordinate it and to invade the sacred rights of the privacy of American citizens whenever he can do so to put filthy dollars in his pocket.

The enemy of a free press in America today is made up of that group willing to trample upon the rights of citizens, seeking to do it by concealing their own poisoned daggers which they would stick in the hearts of those who dare to oppose them, who thereby create an antagonism against the real press, that real part of a real press that places loyalty to the traditions of the press above the dollars which go to enrich the man at the top of the holding-company ladder.

Mr. President, the Senate may be assured that its committee intends to recognize every constitutional privilege of every citizen. It is not going to be alarmed or frightened or intimidated by any manufactured sentiment which some people think is free and voluntary, but behind which, in the main, we find someone pulling the strings because there is something he wants to conceal.

I do not mean to make that statement about all who disagree as to the exact mechanics by which evidence should be secured. I would not leave that inference. But I say that in the main, now as in the Teapot Dome investigation, now as in the Daugherty investigation, now as in the star-route investigation, now as in the crooked-elections investigation, now as in all the other investigations, the loudest noise comes from those who are afraid that something they have done will be exposed to the public view, and that they will be known for what they are instead of what they want the public to believe they are.

Mr. President, no subpoena has been issued by your committee that was not issued after the committee had information, reliable and authentic, upon which the subpoena was based. I did not make any statement last week when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEWART] referred to Mr. Bainbridge Colby as one to whom a subpoena had been issued. The evidence had not come out at that time, but today I did tell the committee the evidence which came out yesterday, showing that telegrams to and from and about Mr. Colby to J. A. Arnold had been destroyed and could not be obtained in the office of Mr. Arnold. I could have gone further and stated that answers to questionnaires had failed to reveal these telegrams from any other source.

Mr. President, I have given only a part of the history of subpoenas and of investigations. The records are filled with criticisms which have appeared from time to time.

I intend, as soon as I shall have finished, to ask unanimous consent to take up in this body for immediate consideration a joint resolution providing that the Senate committee may employ counsel to defend litigation with reference to its powers. I should state what that litigation is.

There is litigation pending against your committee, jointly with the Federal Communications Commission, with reference to the use of telegrams as evidence. If the Senate may be enjoined from the production of telegrams as evidence, it may be enjoined from the use of anything else as evidence, if a judge can be found somewhere who will issue the injunction. I desire to point out to the Senate that you have appointed a committee to investigate the expenditure of money in elections. There is a great desire on the part of some persons to handicap that committee, and to prevent it from obtaining evidence. If injunctions may be issued against the special committee appointed under Senate Resolution 165, if injunctions may stay the hands of witnesses and stop their feet from bringing to that committee written evidence, courts all over the land that would issue those injunctions would likewise have the power to enjoin any witness from coming before your committees and testifying in person.

It may be that the Senate thinks it should be deprived of that power. It may be that there are some who believe that whenever a witness is summoned to appear before a committee of either House or Senate a district court anywhere in the country should have the jurisdiction, if it wishes to do so, to enjoin that witness from appearing before the committee of Senate or House. Whether or not there are some who have that belief, I do not know; but I do know that if the injunction against your committee should be sustained, and if the precedent recently established should be upheld and obeyed, in which the telegraph company was enjoined from bringing telegrams to this body, it is logical that hereafter injunctions will always be issued to prevent evidence coming to the Senate and to prevent witnesses from appearing before the committees.

That would be a wonderful thing for some persons between now and November of this year. Unfortunately, when human beings go on the bench they are not transformed overnight. Such magical transformations do not occur. Mentalities trained in one direction do not suddenly reverse themselves and go back in another. Prejudices, unfortunately, frequently find themselves deeply imbedded in the human mind and the human heart. The lawyer of today is the judge of tomorrow. History has demonstrated that sometimes the judge of today is unable to lift himself far above the passions and prejudices that were engendered in his breast before he went on the bench.

If the district courts of this Nation have the power to issue injunctions to prevent witnesses from appearing before committees of this body, is it too much to believe that when your committee begins to get close to a huge expenditure of money judges may be found somewhere who will be unable to remove themselves from the prejudices of the past, and who will restrain the witnesses, and tie the hands of your committee, and make the resolution providing for the designation of the committee a vain and useless and futile thing?

I am saying these things because I wish to have the issue clearly understood in determining whether or not this body and the other body wish to surrender this power, or wish to fight to maintain the constitutional functions given to them by the founders of the Republic.

So, Mr. President, I have a joint resolution which provides for the employment of counsel, that counsel to be paid an amount fixed by the Senate Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and providing for an appropriation not exceeding $10,000 out of the funds available until June 30, 1937. This joint resolution has the unanimous support of the five members of the special committee. If the Senate should not adopt such a joint resolution, the only authority to employ counsel would be that given to your special committee, with a limitation of $300 per month on the amount to be paid any one person. Of course, I assume that the Senate wishes to have this case decided by the highest tribunal of the Nation. I therefore assume that, if so, it desires proper representation, with a proper fee, in order to protect the constitutional powers of the Senate and the House.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 234. Since it was drawn, I have learned that in order to be in proper form it should have a slight modification. I therefore ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution, and then I shall offer an amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). The joint resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 234) authorizing the Senate Special Committee on Investigation of Lobbying Activities to employ counsel, in connection with certain legal proceedings, and for other purposes, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Senate committee acting under Senate Resolution 165 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, is hereby authorized to employ counsel to represent the said Senate committee and the Senate in connection with legal proceedings relative to the powers of the Congress of the United States growing out of legal proceedings instituted in the court to restrain actions of the said Senate committee in connection with the performance of its duties, the total compensation for such legal services to be fixed by the Senate Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the payment of other expenses necessarily incurred in connection with said litigation to be approved by the said Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, $10,000 to be immediately available under this joint resolution and to remain available until June 30, 1937.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	La Follette	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Costigan	Lewis	Reynolds
Austin	Davis	Logan	Robinson
Bachman	Dickinson	Loneragan	Russell
Bailey	Donahay	Long	Schwellenbach
Barbour	Duffy	McGill	Sheppard
Barkley	Fletcher	McKellar	Shipstead
Benson	Frazier	McNary	Smith
Bilbo	George	Maloney	Steiwer
Black	Gibson	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Glass	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Gore	Murphy	Townsend
Bulow	Guffey	Murray	Vandenberg
Burke	Hale	Neely	Van Nuys
Byrd	Harrison	Norbeck	Wagner
Byrnes	Hatch	Norris	Walsh
Capper	Hayden	Nye	Wheeler
Caraway	Holt	O'Mahoney	White
Chavez	Johnson	Overton
Clark	Keyes	Pittman
Connally	King	Pope

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say to the leader on this side that, in addition to the pending amendment to the Army appropriation bill, there is another amendment which will excite a great deal of debate, and a good many Senators have gone away for the week end. I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas, if it is agreeable to his program, that we let the Army appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside, and take it up on Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it had been my intention, after conferring with a number of Senators, including the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], to move that the Senate take a recess at the conclusion of today's labors until next Monday. It had been my hope that the Army appropriation bill might be disposed of today; but Senators have advised me that a number are absent who would like to be present when the final vote on the amendments to which the Senator from New York has referred may be taken. For that reason I indicate my readiness, when the Senate shall complete its labors today, to move a recess until Monday.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, is it in order for me to ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside?

Mr. ROBINSON. Unless the Senate has completed its labors for the day, I think the Senator would better not do that at this juncture.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I should like to know what is pending before the Senate at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama has asked unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 234.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I assume this is the same resolution the Senator from Alabama read to me a few days ago, and which I have asked to have laid over from day to day until I could confer with Senators on this side.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct, except that I may say to the Senator that I was informed by Mr. Pace, the disbursing officer of the Senate, that it was necessary to add the words "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate", and I have prepared an amendment to add those words to the joint resolution.

Mr. McNARY. The amendment will probably improve the joint resolution in that regard, but I think I shall ask that the joint resolution be read at this time, so that I may have a clear understanding of its purpose and purport.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Senate committee acting under Senate Resolution 165 of the Seventy-fourth Congress is hereby authorized to employ counsel to represent the said Senate committee and the Senate in connection with legal proceedings relative to the powers of the Congress of the United States growing out of legal proceedings instituted in the court to restrain actions of the said Senate committee in connection with the performance of its duties, the total compensation for such legal services to be fixed by the Senate Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the payment of other expenses necessarily incurred in connection with said litigation to be approved by the said Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, $10,000 to be immediately available under this joint resolution and to remain available until June 30, 1937.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am informed that the language of the joint resolution follows the practice and precedents established by the Senate. Is that correct?

Mr. BLACK. I think that is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I assumed so from the very minute the joint resolution was brought before the Senate. The reading by the clerk would indicate that it is in the usual form. It has been the custom of the Senate, when measures of this kind are reported from a committee, to permit the employment of counsel to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. When the matter was first proposed I desired to have time for consultation with Senators and for further consideration. At this time I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I have no objection to the employment by the committee of counsel to the extent the committee may have occasion to employ counsel, but before the joint resolution shall be agreed to I should like to be indulged to ask one or two questions.

In the first place, may I ask the Senator from Alabama whether the joint resolution has gone to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. BLACK. It has not. I may state to the Senator that I discussed the matter with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and with several other Senators, and the conclusion was reached that since the joint resolution really relates to the powers and the duties of the Senate as a whole it was not necessary to refer a measure of this nature to that committee. I may add that I did submit the matter to the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, because it was my idea that the fee the counsel should receive should be fixed by that committee, and I did not want to attempt to impose such responsibility on the committee without at least discussing the matter with the chairman. There is no rule which requires a measure of this kind to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that is correct. What is of more importance, to my mind, is this: What is the occasion at this time for the employment of a counsel; that is, what suits are there to come up in court to restrain the committee?

Mr. BLACK. There is a suit by Mr. William Randolph Hearst against the committee, naming each member of the committee as a respondent.

Mr. STEIWER. Has that not now become really a moot question?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; there were two suits. One suit was against the Western Union Telegraph Co. to restrain the production of a single telegram. The committee, for reasons stated in its letter to the Western Union Telegraph Co., revoked the particular subpoena involved in that case, stating that the matter could be handled for the Senate in a suit where the Senate itself could appear and help to make the issue and determine the controversy.

It was believed and known by the Senate committee that in a suit between the Western Union Telegraph Co. and Mr. Hearst it was to the pecuniary advantage of the Western Union Telegraph Co. not to contest the suit. Therefore, we did not consider that that would be a real trial.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senate committee was not a party to that suit.

Mr. BLACK. No; the Senate committee was not a party to that suit.

Mr. ROBINSON. And no member of the Senate committee was a party to that suit.

Mr. BLACK. No; nor did we have anything to do with establishing the issues in that suit.

Mr. STEIWER. That is a very interesting phase of the matter. Is it proposed, therefore, to employ counsel, not for that case but because there is another case in which the Senate committee is made a party? The employment of counsel is not in connection with the first suit, to which the Senator has referred, but is in connection with the suit in which the Senate committee has been interpleaded as party defendant?

Mr. BLACK. I may say to the Senator that in connection with the first suit the Senate committee felt that it should have a lawyer, and the lawyer was sent for, and has been here in connection with both suits up to the time that the other case, I assume, has become a moot case. But the employment now, so far as the joint resolution is concerned, is made necessary by the suit of Mr. Hearst against the entire membership of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alabama has asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair further understands that the Senator from Alabama desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the joint resolution, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 6, after the word "available", it is proposed to insert "from the contingent fund of the Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MINTON subsequently said: Mr. President, it seems that all of the newspapers of the country are not in accord with Mr. Hearst in his attitude toward the Lobby Committee of the Senate. A very fine editorial appeared in the Capital Times, of Madison, Wis., in its issue of Tuesday, March 17, entitled "We Repudiate Selfish Use of 'Freedom of the Press.'" I think it would be very appropriate to have this editorial appear in the RECORD following the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on the freedom of the press, and I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Capital Times, Madison, Wis., of Mar. 17, 1936]

WE REPUDIATE SELFISH USE OF "FREEDOM OF THE PRESS"

An editorial by William T. Evjue

The AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York City.

DEAR SIR: Under date of March 12 the Associated Press sent out the following story from New York:

"The American Newspaper Publishers' Association tonight denounced as a violation of constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press the reported seizure by the Black committee of a telegram from William Randolph Hearst to one of his editors. The association advised any other editor, should he learn of similar action, to consult counsel immediately and take vigorous steps to protect his constitutional rights."

This letter is written in order that this newspaper can go on record as repudiating the things that are being done by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association in the name of American newspapers and American journalism.

The attempt of the big metropolitan newspaper publishers, operating through the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, to identify their greed and selfish aims with the defense of the freedom of the press and other constitutional guaranties is nothing but a fraud and a sham. The Capital Times is one newspaper that will have no part in the conspiracy of these big metropolitan publishers who snipe at one public-welfare proposal after another under the hypocritical disguise of defending the freedom of the press.

I want to protest, too, against the activities of that super-lobbyist at Washington, Elisha Hanson, who presumes to speak for American newspapers as the representative of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. The Capital Times contends that Mr. Hanson is doing a big disservice to the best traditions of journalism by continually making use of the principle of the freedom of the press to serve the selfish, unsocial purposes of the powerful privileged interests he represents.

Need the American newspaper publishers be reminded that the masses of the people in the United States are losing their confidence in the American newspapers? Whenever the public interest is on one side and the interest of privilege and wealth on the other, nine times out of ten the newspapers line up on the side of greed and selfishness.

When the American newspapers were asked to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with other business concerns in endeavoring to decrease unemployment under the N. R. A., the newspapers refused to be licensed under the N. R. A. because of the contention that such a license would be surrendering the freedom of the press—"a principle which the newspapers were sacredly obligated to defend." This contention was a lot of bunk, because the newspapers have already been licensed for decades, as will be pointed out later in this letter.

The newspapers used the freedom of the press to bring about the defeat of the child-labor amendment to the United States Constitution. Newspapers hypocritically contended that for the United States Government to interfere with the right of newspapers to hire newsboys of tender years would be an invasion of the freedom of the press.

When the Roosevelt administration attempted to put a bill through Congress to clean up crooked and false advertising in the United States through which the people of this country are being mulcted out of millions of dollars each year, the newspapers again used the pious phrase "freedom of the press" to defeat a measure which would interfere with their "freedom" to exploit the American people through fraudulent advertising.

When American publishers are asked to recognize the right of editorial employees to organize for their own betterment, the newspaper publishers again hypocritically argue that it would be a violation of the freedom of the press to bargain collectively with their employees, who have been notoriously underpaid.

The above is only a short catalog of the different occasions on which the newspaper publishers have used the principle of the freedom of the press in order to serve their own selfish interests as against the public interest. Now comes the latest episode in which the newspapers are again using the principle of the freedom of the press to thwart the United States Senate in its long-recognized right of investigation to uncover practices that are against public interest.

The Capital Times believes that the right given to a congressional or legislative body to investigate is the best insurance in the possession of the American people against corruption and wrongdoing. The United States Senate has a long and honorable record in exposing corrupt and subversive activities on the part of powerful privileged interests. It is not to the credit of the American newspapers that the newspapers have, in the main, maintained a hostile attitude toward investigations that sought to expose the criminal and corrupt activities of selfish groups. Does the answer lie in the fact that on many occasions the groups being investigated are in a position to control advertising?

One need only to recall the hostile attitude of the newspapers toward the Nye war-munitions investigation, the investigation of the big public utilities, and other investigations to appraise the attitude of the American newspapers on the subject of investigations.

One need only to recall the criminal indifference of the American press to the Teapot Dome investigation to show that this hostility of the American press has extended from 1920 down. Here was a case where powerful, selfish private interests had robbed the United States of oil resources valued at $100,000,000. Senators La Follette and Walsh started the investigation under the most discouraging circumstances. The newspapers maintained an attitude of indifference or open hostility. On March 31, 1924, the powerful New York Times had the following to say concerning the United States Senate's investigation of Teapot Dome:

"A few Senators at Washington have borne themselves like men who at heart are enemies of lawful and orderly government. They profess to be engaged in the laudable effort to uncover corruption. . . . But they make it seem that the real purpose is to paralyze the administration, to terrorize members of the Cabinet, to break down the efficiency of the Government. The investigators are scandalmongers and assassins of character."

Paul Y. Anderson, Washington correspondent, says:

"The propaganda against investigations began with the oil investigations conducted by Senator Walsh and the investigation of the Department of Justice (Harry Daugherty) conducted by Senator WHEELER. In the light of what has occurred since, I dare say few editors will relish being remembered as defenders of Fall, Sinclair, Doheny, Daugherty, Jess Smith, and the little green house on Kay Street. Nevertheless, it was the New York Times which described Senators Walsh and WHEELER as the Montana mud gunners when they undertook to expose the unspeakable frauds which had been perpetrated against the Nation and the unutterable rotteness which existed at the very heart of the Government."

"From Teapot Dome down to the present Black investigation the tactics of the American press have been the same. Today Senators Nye, of the munitions investigation, and BLACK, of the lobby investigation, are being called black dragons, snoopers, chekas. Will all the bitterness that characterized the newspaper attacks on Senators in an earlier day whose investigations restored $100,000,000 in oil resources back to the United States Government, the attack on those who seek to use the power of investigation for the public interest continues."

"Now, as a final clincher to show the hypocrisy of the big publishers, let's draw a parallel that will show how these big publishers are only concerned with the freedom of the press when it can be used to serve their selfish purposes."

When the N. R. A. was being drafted the newspapers bitterly fought the proposal under the N. R. A. to license newspapers in the same way as other businesses were licensed in order that the Government could have regulation over hours and wages under the N. R. A. The big newspapers loudly contended that it would be an invasion of the freedom of the press to license newspapers under the N. R. A.—that such a proposal would subject newspaper control to bureaucratic domination at Washington. Because of their power, the newspapers succeeded in keeping the license provision as affecting newspapers out of the N. R. A.

But every reputable newspaper in the United States has been licensed by the United States Government for decades, and no protest has ever come from the big publishers. In nearly every newspaper in the country you will note the little agate-line statement on the editorial page: "Entered as second-class matter under the act of March 3, 1879." Second-class mailing rights is a special concession given to newspapers and magazines.

Before a newspaper can avail itself of second-class mailing rights, however, it must obtain a license from the United States Post Office Department. The United States Postmaster General can revoke this license or permit without hearing any time he so chooses. During the World War the second-class mailing rights of many newspapers in the United States were revoked, and no complaint ever came from the big publishers who today are so blatant in their devotion to the freedom of the press.

Why don't the big publishers complain against the license of the United States Post Office Department? Here is the answer: According to the United States Post Office Department, the cost of handling second-class mail matter during 1935 was $105,474,053. The newspapers and magazines paid the United States Post Office Department $18,423,226. It therefore cost the United States Government $86,000,000 to pay the deficit on carrying second-class mail for newspapers and magazines.

When the newspapers of the United States are asked to submit to a license by the United States Government under the N. R. A. in order that the Government can control wages and hours to cut down unemployment, the newspapers loudly yell that such a proposal is unconstitutional because it violates the principle of freedom of the press.

When the newspapers, however, can dip into the United States Treasury to the extent of $86,000,000 a year and get Uncle Sam to pay the cost of delivering their newspapers, then they make no protest against being licensed by the United States Post Office Department. Doesn't that accurately reveal the real motives which are back of the professions of the big publishers of the United States on freedom of the press?

How long do these big publishers who dominate the American Newspaper Publishers Association think they can fool the American people with this kind of hypocrisy? If these big publishers continue to use the freedom of the press as a bugaboo to thwart every honest attempt that is made to serve the public interest, the newspapers will get the public condemnation to which they are so richly entitled.

The Capital Times wants to repudiate the things which your organization is doing and which are fast bringing the American press and American journalism into disrepute.

Very sincerely yours,

WILLIAM T. EVJUE, Editor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 20, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend W. Angie Smith, pastor, Mount Vernon Place Methodist Episcopal Church South, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our gracious Heavenly Father, creator of the heavens and the earth, the giver of all good and perfect gifts, we would unite our prayers this morning unto Thee, because unto Thee and Thee only do we look for strength, for inspiration, and for divine guidance. We would pray especially this morning for a unity of thought in this hour of need, while so many of our Nation are suffering from the ravages of flood and other disasters. Wilt Thou touch the heart of this our Nation and so create in the mind of each of us a desire to help, that our benevolent impulses may respond to the need of these our very own. We would pray this morning for these Thy servants, our Representatives, as they lead our Nation in the avenue of peace and toward prosperity, that our thoughts and our lives may be guarded and directed by that mind and that thought which alone comes from the throne of God. Bless each as an individual, and bless especially, our Heavenly Father, this very morning, our Nation and the nations of the world, and so guard and guide us in all of our activities until the kingdom of God shall come here upon earth, and that we may not only understand Thy will but with a new and a definite encouragement be able to say, "Thy will be done." Though we be divided by race and by color and different conceptions of Thee, may we all be united into one brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God. Through the Redeemer, our Lord and our Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

TAX ON IMPORTED OIL

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, Texas this year is celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of her independence. Through the century which has passed, both Texas and Mexico have grown into closer relations of friendship and business interests. A common misfortune for which neither is to blame also unites them closely today. Both Texas and Mexico today are the victims of exploiters. Mexico's valuable petroleum resources are in a large degree controlled by foreign corporations who use them to dominate the markets in other lands, notably in the United States, while neither Mexico nor the Mexicans receive what they might consider the proper return for their petroleum products. Mexico has taken unusual steps to safeguard her petroleum reserves, even imposing an export duty upon oil, but foreign capital in Mexico is today using that oil in a way which damages both the Republic of Mexico, the State of Texas, and the domestic petroleum industry in the United States.

Today imported petroleum, much of which comes from Mexico, is directly affecting practically all the economic factors in my State. Due to the lower production cost of that imported petroleum, the price Texas receives for the product of one of Texas' greatest natural resources is held below its proper price level and the public revenues of the State itself, to which the petroleum is the heaviest contributor, are decreased as truly and as surely as though an armed enemy had invaded our borders and removed this sum from the treasury of the State.

The oil industry in Texas contributes over 50 percent of the public revenues. It holds under lease one-fourth of the acreage of the State. It contributes to farmers, landowners, and investors in royalties, rentals, and bonuses $102,000,000. Its annual pay roll is approximately $266,000,000, over 675,000 Texans being dependent upon it for their living.

This is the industry so vital to the prosperity and well-being of the sovereign State of Texas which is today handicapped and depressed by the invasion of cheap foreign oil. The importation of that oil is one of the reasons why Texas producers have been forced to curtail their production and were for a long time prevented from receiving anything approaching a reasonable price for their oil. Today, while the price of crude oil has advanced slightly, the expected and merited increase in price which all the other economic factors would justify is being prevented by the competition offered by this cheap oil from other lands.

Texas is the principal oil producing State in the Union. Within her borders lies the great east Texas field, one of the greatest, if not the very greatest, oil fields known. It has been estimated by competent geologists that this field, if opened up to its full producing potentiality, could for a time produce many times as much oil as the entire world consumes, but neither is the east Texas field nor the State of Texas as a whole with its 52,300 producing oil wells permitted more than a fraction of its possible output. The market which might naturally be found by the Texas petroleum and its products is today being taken by the cheap foreign oil to the amount of over $47,000,000 a year. Only a part of these imports pays any tax whatever to the Federal Government. Its low production costs make it possible for this oil to undersell any oil produced on a sound business basis in this country.

The resulting situation is that the amount of oil which the sovereign State of Texas can market profitably is actually determined by a foreign product. The number of Texans who can be given employment in the petroleum industry in this State is limited by the amount of foreign oil produced by cheap foreign labor which takes the place of the Texas product. The very revenues of our State are reduced since Texas business and Texas production must be held down because oil produced in other lands can undersell us in our own home markets.

The petroleum industry deserves well of the State of Texas. It has paid to the farmers of Texas $54,533,000 in rentals and royalties during the year 1934, the latest for which statistics are available. It has leased from these same farmers 44,000,000 acres at an average of 40 cents per acre, bringing to the farmers $17,600,000, or only $1,000,000 less than the total amount of taxes levied on Texas farm property during 1934. It has invested in petroleum production $1,310,000,000; $70,000,000 in natural gasoline, $309,600,000 in pipe lines and $114,482,000 in marketing properties.

The Texas petroleum industry is building a future for the youth of this State. From that industry there comes the larger part of the support of public schools and universities. Two million acres of land in 19 counties in west Texas was set aside in the days of the Republic of Texas for the support of a university. With the discovery of the Big Lake oil field in Reagan County on university land, oil companies took leases on 279,000 acres of land belonging to the University of Texas, of which 12,320 acres are producing oil and gas. In the brief period since 1923, the discovery date of the Big Lake field, to August 1935, the permanent fund of the university has received in oil and gas royalties and in bonuses and rentals, $21,500,000, while the current income of the university from royalties is $675,000 a year, and $60,000 a year from rentals.

Oil is today the most important industry in the State of Texas. Whatever interferes with the well-being of that industry immediately affects the business life of the entire State. With an investment of $1,804,000,000, exclusive of refining interests, the State's income from this natural resource is nearly $400,000,000 a year. Nearly one-fourth of the total area of the State, or 44,000,000 acres, are under oil leases today, the owners of this property receiving annually approximately $15,000,000 from these leases, the total receipts of the owners, including bonuses and royalties as well as rentals, amounting to over $100,000,000 every year.

Over 50 percent of the total taxes collected by the State government of Texas is derived from taxation of the products and the properties of the petroleum industry, of which $31,640,000 was collected through the State gasoline tax.

In addition to an annual pay roll of $150,000,000, the oil industry in Texas expends approximately $200,000,000 a year for material and supplies and services.

Today Texas is cooperating with other States to control production in order to eliminate wasteful practices. Texas has not only passed legislation to enable the State to control petroleum production within its borders but was one of the leaders in obtaining the authority of Congress to set up the interstate oil compact by which various States may unite in coordinating their efforts in the prevention of wasteful production.

Texas in the year 1935 produced a total of 391,097,000 barrels of petroleum. That was the output for 365 days. A full-flow test made last year of key wells in the East Texas field showed that if the 17,000 wells in that area were permitted to produce without restraint, they would turn out 336,000,000 barrels of crude oil in a single day of 24 hours.

East Texas wells are not producing that amount, of course. They were limited through much of the year to 3.4 percent of 1 hour's potential flow. The oil industry in Texas, with some exceptions, approves of some degree of limitation in the interest of the conservation of natural resources, the prevention of waste, and the proper supply of domestic markets. But the oil industry in Texas does feel that since it has placed production limitations upon the oil wells of that State, the foreign product should not be admitted without regulation and without limitation of any kind. If it is proper that Texas wells should be shut in, it is equally proper that the foreign supply of oil shall be equally and proportionately shut in.

Because of this, I introduced on January 25, 1935, H. R. 4744 to increase the taxes on imported crude petroleum and gas and fuel oil from $\frac{1}{2}$ a cent to 1 cent a gallon; to add a tax of \$2 per ton on imported asphalt, to remove the limit on the oil import taxes, and to strike from the revenue act the exemption from tax of fuel oil imported as "supplies of vessels." That bill which is still before the Ways and Means Committee is in these respects identical with the bill introduced by the gentleman from Oklahoma who has added one very valuable item to his proposal, namely, the definite limitation of petroleum imports to a fixed proportion of the national demand.

All that has been done by and for the oil industry in Texas depends upon one uncertain element. The State is regulating its production. Through the Interstate Compact Commission, it is cooperating with other States who are likewise regulating their output of crude oil. So far as our own domestic production is concerned, Texas knows where it stands today and where it may stand in the coming months. However, the domestic supply of petroleum is not the only factor in the markets of the United States. All that Texas and the other oil States have done to prevent a wasteful oversupply with the breaking of the market and its harmful effect upon employment and business conditions in general, can be nullified at any time by the will of a half dozen men who make the decisions for those large companies now importing foreign oil. The self-restraint shown by the oil industry in Texas may be of no avail if these importers should decide that in any given period they will largely increase their imports. Texas after all is not independent.

Vitality important to my State and to the people of that State at large and not merely to the oil industry in Texas is the adoption of those policies which are set forth in my bill, H. R. 4744, and in the Disney oil import bill, H. R. 10483. The import taxes provided in those bills, while providing revenue for the Federal Government, will also make it possible for the oil industry in Texas to operate without incurring those tremendous losses which marked the years prior to our recent recovery. The definite limitation which the Disney bill sets upon imports will free the State of Texas as it will free all the oil States of the Union from that constant threat that all their efforts at stabilization and conservation may be made vain at any time by vastly increased imports. The statistics which have been made available to the industry show that these imports have been steadily increasing. Supposed to be held within the limits of the last 6 months of 1932, they have been exceeding those limits by great quantities. "Hot imports" are today as serious a danger to the economics of the petroleum industry as was ever "hot oil" in the days when Texas or Oklahoma or the other oil States were struggling with the task of working out a practical and equitable system of production regulation.

Texas will know a larger degree of independence if this oil import measure is passed. Then it will no longer have to dread an invasion by a foreign product which would threaten its markets. Then its public revenues would not be menaced by forced contributions levied upon the State by the importers of foreign oil. Then its industry and its workers would be free to transact business and to engage in their employment without the fear that foreign oil fields and foreign workers would dispossess them.

If this task could be accomplished by Texas alone, Texas would have done this by herself. If Texas were still a Republic, we would not today have to ask the Federal Government to protect us against these invading shiploads of foreign products. Texas, however, was glad and proud to lay aside her status as a sovereign nation and enter the family of States in the Union. The powers with relation to foreign commerce we once possessed we transferred to the Federal Government. Now we are asking that Government to use these powers for our protection. We are not asking this as a favor. We are asking it as a right and as an act of justice. We are not demanding it, however, but we are pointing to the situation which exists and asking that it be cured.

We are not seeking unfair advantages. The good that will come to the State of Texas from this legislation will come also to the other oil States of the Union. If this legislation should profit Texas more than it profits some of the other oil States, then it is merely because Texas is larger and because the known reservoirs of oil in Texas are greater. The good which will come from this legislation will not be limited either to Texas or even to all the oil-producing States. Instead it will act as a guaranty that this industry, which was the first to show signs of recovery and which has made remarkable contributions to the restoration of prosperity, will continue to make its contributions of countless millions of dollars to the workers, the farmers, the land-owners, and the investors of the Nation.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, I received in yesterday morning's mail 37 letters, of which the letter I hold in my hand is an exact copy. This is just one of the letters which I received. They were all written from the city of Utica, N. Y., one of the cities in my congressional district, and refer to a given piece of legislation which is now pending either in committee or in the House. The exact status of the legislation I do not know. I want to say, as a matter of fairness, that I have not made up my mind or formed any opinion as to whether I shall vote for or against the bill when it comes on the floor for consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I am taking this time not in an effort to do anything against the bill or for the bill, but because I believe this is a particular form of propaganda which is subversive of good citizenship. These letters were all written on the same typewriter. That is, the envelopes were addressed by the same typewriter. The letter itself is mimeographed and evidently all of the letters were signed by the same person. The names attached to these various letters are employees, most of them young girls, in a certain store, one of the chain stores in the city of Utica. I am going to give the name of this store so that no other chain-store organization will be under unjust suspicion. The name of the store is Neisner's.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Sisson. I yield to the gentleman from Minnestota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. To what legislation does the correspondence refer?

Mr. Sisson. These letters refer to the so-called Robinson-Patman or Utterback bill, and I am asked to vote against the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this particular letter in the RECORD, leaving off the signer of the letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. Sisson. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this is not that it will influence me either to vote for the bill or against the bill, because finally I hope I will be just enough to size up the bill on its merits when it comes before the Members of the House for consideration. I think it is improper and unfair for an employer to compel, as evidently this employer has, these girls, who are overworked and underpaid, to sign such letters and send them to Congressmen at the pains probably of losing their jobs.

Mr. Speaker, the letter referred to is as follows:

FRED J. Sisson,

Congressman, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I protest against the provisions of the Robinson-Patman bill, as I am of the opinion that this bill will tend to raise prices and will be to the disadvantage of the consuming public. I therefore would appreciate your negative vote on this bill.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced in this House a bill appropriating $50,000,000 for the relief of the flood victims. I plead with the membership of this House to take immediate action on this bill.

I ask this not only for the city of Pittsburgh and for a large part of the State of Pennsylvania, which today is crippled and devastated, but for every community and area which has been overwhelmed in the past few days by one of the greatest disasters in our Nation's history.

We cannot delay. As the flood waters slowly recede, the still greater dangers of pestilence, plague, and famine stalk every stricken area.

No words of mine can adequately bring to you the picture of distress and fear, of desolation and want, which face our people. I saw it in my own district up until 2 days ago. I am going back today to do whatever I can to help.

I want to go back there and tell my people that the Federal Government will recognize their need and is going to help. I want to take to them a message of hope.

I ask the Members of the House to make this possible.

We are faced with a national disaster, and the relief must be national. It is the responsibility of this body to provide full and adequate relief and to avert the dangers which still impede.

The heart of this Nation has always been quick to respond to calls for aid. Even when the call came from far-off China this Congress responded. Can we deny the needs of our very own when it has been the traditional policy of the Congress to extend aid in cases of national disaster?

Mr. Speaker, 2 years ago, when a great drought struck another great section of the country, we all worked shoulder to shoulder and swiftly gave the necessary financial aid. We of the East came to the help of the West because we recognized that the concern was as much ours as yours. Today the East is just as terribly stricken, and now the East and West, North and South must make common cause against a great natural enemy.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations will speedily report out this bill and that the House and Senate will enact it.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I understand there is about $6,000,000 of unexpended balances in the so-called emergency appropriations in the hands of the President. Has the gentleman tried to ascertain whether or not the amount needed for relief in the city of Pittsburgh and elsewhere could be taken from these funds?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I have; and the information I get is to the effect that it will probably not be possible to appropriate the money for the type of relief that is needed in the flood areas.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. It would be a very simple matter for the Congress to so amend that act as to make the money that is now in the hands of the President available for this purpose.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I shall be very pleased if the House should see fit to amend that bill so as to provide the necessary relief funds in that way.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman to state that he has introduced a bill asking for $50,000,000?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. That will be insufficient to take care of the situation. I have introduced one asking for $1,000,000,000 and this will not even begin to take care of it.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I may say to my colleague from Pennsylvania that the West Branch Valley of the Susquehanna River, including the cities of Renovo, Lock Haven, Jersey Shore, Williamsport, Muncy, and Montgomery, has had a flood 2 feet higher than the great flood of 1889 and the conditions in the west branch of the Susquehanna River are very bad at the present time. Relief for the homeless and poor is imperative at once.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I am very pleased to have the help of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield so that I may ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] a question?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania favoring an appropriation for this purpose?

Mr. RICH. In a case of absolute need of this kind, nobody in the House of Representatives would be more desirous of voting funds for the relief of such needs. I always have done this and I always will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very pleased to hear the gentleman make that statement, because he has been very critical of other appropriations for relief, and I am asking him, "Where are you going to get the money." [Laughter.]

Mr. RICH. We can get money for purposes of this kind and we should save money when it comes to things that are unnecessary, like many of the ridiculous bills passed during this session of Congress.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I believe every Member of Congress knows there is a great deal of suffering going on in the United States because of the terrible floods, and I am convinced beyond any doubt that every man here is willing to do his utmost to alleviate the suffering of the people of our country.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be permitted to read it in my time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution to provide at least a billion dollars for the immediate relief of the suffering people in the flooded areas of our country

Whereas within the past 10 days hundreds of thousands of people in the United States and its possessions have been made homeless because of the terrible floods and fires; and

Whereas billions of dollars' worth of property damage has been caused by floods and fires; and

Whereas hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children are homeless because of these floods and fires; and

Whereas an epidemic of disease has already started in many of the stricken areas and will spread throughout the country unless something is done immediately to prevent it; and

Whereas the human suffering cannot be measured by dollars and cents: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the Senate concurs in this resolution), That the President of the United States shall be empowered to take from the Treasury Department a billion dollars, or more if necessary, to provide food, shelter, clothing, medical aid, and other necessities for the immediate relief of the suffering people of our country; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States shall be empowered to loan money to the people to recondition their homes, and also to people whose business establishments have been damaged by the floods and fires; and be it further

Resolved, That not more than 1 percent interest shall be charged to any person borrowing this money; and be it further

Resolved, That the President of the United States shall do whatever he believes is essential to carry out the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 additional minutes, so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Pennsylvania requesting 2 additional minutes?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I will try to answer his question in 1 minute.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would the gentleman support an amendment to direct the money to be turned over to the Red Cross so as to obviate all the large overhead costs of administration?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. It is not necessary to spend gigantic sums of money for overhead expenses when there is an emergency. Many people would be willing to give their services gratis at a time like this, and I believe that the President would do his utmost to see that the money goes for relief purposes.

Mr. KNUTSON. My guess is that only the Republicans would give their services gratis.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. There are many Republicans in the flood area and we should help them too. [Applause.]

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that such a request should be submitted subject to the special order of the House that has been previously granted.

The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order for today he may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENTERTAINMENT OF DOUGHBOYS IN THE TRENCHES

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include some interesting remarks recently made by our colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] before the Library Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, having been granted unanimous consent to extend my remarks, I insert excerpts before the Committee on the Library by Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., Representative in Congress from the State of Massachusetts:

Mr. CONNERY. You spoke, Congressman TREADWAY, about Elsie Janis and her fine work in France. That was true. I do not say this in a sense of egotism but just talking to answer these questions in my own way. I was a private in A Company, One Hundred and First Infantry. We would go into the trenches 5 days and when we came out for a few days nothing so cheered us up and revived us as the entertainments which have been spoken of. I should say first here that I was 29 years old when I enlisted. When we were going over to France on the Henry R. Mallory, a fruit steamer, I used to watch those men. I said, "Here is a lot of young fellows; they are apparently happy and carefree. They don't know what they are going up against. They think war is a laugh. They are thrilled by the glory of war. I had read all about it during those 4 years of the war before we entered the war. But when we got over to France I saw the change. I saw these happy boys become careworn men. When they were in the trenches and attacked by the Germans and saw their comrades killed, saw them gassed and maimed, slept in the filth of the dugouts, tortured by the cooties and the rats, the bursting shells, the shrieking of shrapnel, it is a wonder to me now that any of us who heard those Austrian 88's bursting in the air would ever have any nerves left in our bodies.

When we would come out of the trenches, Father O'Connor, who was the Catholic chaplain, and Rev. Lyman Rollins, who was the Protestant chaplain, of our regiment, the One Hundred and First Infantry of the Twenty-sixth Division, which division served longer in the front-line trenches than any division in the A. E. F.—that is why President Wilson had Christmas dinner in 1918 with and reviewed the Twenty-sixth Division when he came over to France, the chaplains would say "Billy, will you put on a show?"

We would go down to the little Y. M. C. A. or K. of C. or Salvation Army hut and I would arrange a program. We would get some of G Company and some of D Company or F or M or any other company who were piano players and others would sing solos or recite and we would put on comedy skits. I would look over those men with their heads down and hearts made heavy by their experience in the trenches. Their morale was way down. We would put on those little shows and we would see their faces brighten up and when they would go back to their dugouts that night to sleep there was an entirely different feeling in the atmosphere of the "gang."

Then it was I had the glorious experience which to me will be the pleasantest memory of my life, that, having been on the stage for 10 years and having a little faculty of entertaining, telling them stories and putting on the little skits for them I was able to cheer them up at such a time. To me that is the greatest joy I have ever had in my life, to see those faces light up and to see their countenances brighten and hear their hearty laughter. And later when I was evacuated to the hospital from the Argonne front, telling the stories to the gangs in the hospital around me is a happy remembrance.

Mr. Chairman, I have had the privilege of singing songs and telling stories to men who within a short half hour afterward were dead on the field of battle. I have sung and told funny—I hope—stories to men with shattered bodies in the field hospitals just back of the lines when I felt I could hardly talk with the lump in my throat as I looked at them.

I have stood in a boxing ring with an audience of three or four thousand soldiers and sang and presented a minstrel show while German shells whizzing high over our heads added their shrill whistle to the music of the band. During a cessation of the day's attack during the 18th of July, Aisne Marne drive, I can remember rustling up boxes and bacon cans to present a minstrel circle in the woods outside the shell-torn village of Vaux. I can still see the picture of a Sunday afternoon in the St. Mihiel sector as I stood before a group of two or three hundred muddy, dirty, fighting doughboys and watched them laugh as I sang a parody on the song Giddy Giddap Giddap, depicting the woes of a private's life in the Army. In the trenches, out of the trenches, in camp, in the snow, in the mud, in the night, on the hikes, day in and day out for 19 months I learned to my amazement what music means to a fighting man, what laughter means to morale, and that is why I have told you some of my own experiences entertaining my buddies, so that I can bring out most forcibly what George M. Cohan did for the entire A. E. F. when he wrote Over There.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am sure our chairman, Mr. KELLER, would be delighted to hear one of the French stories. You are making a most interesting statement. Just tell us one of those stories by way of illustration of the way you entertained our soldier boys.

Mr. CONNERY. I was in the hospital at Autleul, on the race course outside of Paris. That was after the Aisne Marne offensive. They had a hospital right there on the race course, and when I was convalescent they let me go down town. I came to a great big square where a monument to the Bastille is located. I saw an American soldier doing traffic duty probably to direct our own Army vehicles. I went over to talk to him and found out his name was McCarthy and that he came from New York City. While talking to him suddenly a big limousine came tearing out of a side street and nearly knocked the pair of us down. By the way, if you knock a man down with an automobile in Paris they arrest the man who was knocked down for obstructing traffic. McCarthy pulled the French chauffeur down off the automobile, and they had a very spirited argument. The Frenchman could not speak a word of English and McCarthy could not speak a word of French, so this is the way the argument sounded: "Eh bien, monsieur. Je vous dis, que je suis le meilleur juge de cette machine. C'est moi qui l'a batie, n'est-ce-pas? J'attachai ce fil de fer dans un moment et je continuerai sur mon chemin. Cette machine fut batie ici en France! Moi, je suis francais mais vous, vous etes un Americain! Qu'est-ce que vous savez des machines francaises? Rien! Absolument rien!"

McCarthy looked at the Frenchman and said, "You are a damn liar. The marines won the war." [Laughter.] I need hardly state that McCarthy was a marine.

We had an old mess sergeant named Tom Dooley. I do not know how old Tom was; he must have been at least 50 years of age. I do not know how he managed to stay in the service. When we were in a little village called Blenod les toul, Tom wanted to get a drink. He knew very little French, but he knew that "avez-vous" meant "have you", and he knew what "bon jour" meant. He undertook, in his Irish brogue, to tell in French the old lady in charge what he wanted. He said "Bon jour, Madam." She said, "Bon jour, Monsieur." He said "Avez-vous, avez-vous, have you any champagne in the house?" She said, "Il n'y en a plus", meaning "there is no more." Then he said "Now, my good woman, avez-vous, avez-vous, have you any vin rouge or vin blanc or whatever in hell you have good to drink, I'd be glad to have some." She said, "Il n'y en a plus." Tom said, "Well, glory be to St. Patrick, give me a bottle of alley-ploo."

Mr. TREADWAY. Those are the things you were telling the boys?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; and making up parodies about the officers. It is a wonder I was not court-martialed. I used to tell stories and sing parodies about the majors, colonels, and generals right to their faces. It is a wonder I was not put in the jug many a time, but they were good-natured.

That is the glory, to me personally. When I get to be an old man I expect that will be the greatest thing in my life, to look back and see that I was able to cheer up those fellows a bit.

I got a letter from a woman whose boy died alongside of me in the hospital. I got that letter after he died, about 2 months afterward, and she told me that the last letter she had gotten from her boy was one telling her I had sung for him the comic Irish song, What Could You Expect of a Man Named McCarthy? He had written her, she said, such a winning letter about the enjoyment he had in his bed alongside this fellow from Massachusetts. I cried when I read that letter. The point I bring out is, that was joy enough for me.

Elsie Janis did wonderful work in France. It was marvelous. She came out to the front line and sang to the boys and was the idol of our soldiers there.

Mr. TREADWAY. Did you ever join with her in those entertainments?

Mr. CONNERY. No; I will tell you. Elsie Janis came out to entertain the One Hundred and First Infantry when we had just come out of the line for a few days, and were at Aulnois, in the Toul sector, and in the middle of her entertainment she said, "Now, is there not somebody in your regiment who can entertain me? If there is, stand up and sing a song or tell some stories." The gang shouted, "Where is BILL CONNERY?" and it made it very embarrassing for me later, because I was A. W. O. L. over in Toul for 2 nights to get some squash pie. I had not had a piece of pie since I had left the United States almost a year before. I heard that Joe McInerney, a K. of C. secretary from Lynn, was in Toul, so I went over there A. W. O. L., and he fed me squash pie. I ate four squash pies that day at one sitting. So I didn't see Elsie at all. I was more than disappointed, because we all thought that she was great. So when I came back, Captain Murphy, the adjutant of the regiment, said, "Where in the hell were you? We were looking for you. Did you have a pass?" I said, "No; I went over to get some squash pie in Toul", and he said, "Where did you get the pie?" I told him and he said, "Well, I'll let you off this time." He let me off because he knew I'd fix him up later for some pie with Joe Mac, which I did. So there is my experience of missing seeing Elsie Janis.

There is one thing I forgot to mention. The first thing in the mind of any man in any regiment of the American Expeditionary Forces coming out of the trenches was—what do you think? First it was food; then a smoke, and then it was "Where is the band?" "Give us the band." They wanted music. They wanted their morale lifted up. I saw that so many times on all of the fronts. In the little French villages I saw these men up on the top of French huts, and on stone walls, and lying on the ground listening to the band; I saw them coming from all sections. It did something big for them; it built up their morale.

I want to apologize for being so long in my statement, but with the feeling of friendship that I have for George Cohan, when I get to talking about his life and work it is not easy to stop.

Mr. TREADWAY. You have not only talked about George Cohan, but you have given us a very interesting side picture of things which some of us were never privileged to see and experience, and I appreciate your statement very much. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the privilege, with the consent of the committee, of having a copy made for our own use of the description that Mr. CONNERY has given us of his experiences in the entertainment line among his buddies overseas. He certainly contributed to the pleasure and maintenance of morale.

GEN. HIGINIO ALVAREZ

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I enclose a report concerning the claim of Gen. Higinio Alvarez, a Mexican citizen, with respect to lands on the Farmers Banco in the State of Arizona. The report requests that the Congress authorize an appropriation of $20,000 to settle this claim.

I recommend that the Congress authorize an appropriation of $20,000 to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

NINTH INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF MILITARY MEDICINE AND PHARMACY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State, with an accompanying memorandum, to the end that legislation may be enacted authorizing an appropriation of the sum of $11,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the expenses of participation by the United States in the Ninth International Congress of Military Medicine and Pharmacy to convene in Rumania in 1937, and authorizing and requesting the President to extend an invitation to the International Congress of Military Medicine and Pharmacy to hold its tenth congress in the United States in 1939, and to invite foreign governments to participate in that congress.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 20, 1936.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ROGERS] for 10 minutes.

THE STORY OF P. W. A.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, 3 years have elapsed since President Roosevelt, mustering all forces of government to curb an economic disease which had reached epidemic proportions, planned America's first national public-works program. When the Congress, acting on his recommendation, established the Public Works Administration the national economy was indeed a grievously sick patient, lying in a deep coma, resisting all attempts to awaken it with formulas of optimism, with words of good cheer.

A crisis was imminent when P. W. A. and a group of new specialists were summoned to the bedside. They prescribed definite forms of treatment for the sick economy, spurning the discredited incantations of those faith healers who had been promising the patient that "confidence" alone would assure his recovery.

The Nation had faith in these new physicians, and the last 3 years have proven conclusively that that faith was not misplaced. The salutary effects of public-works treatment have long been felt, and the fact that the patient is now well on the way to recovery is due in no small measure to the sound, vigorous treatment which P. W. A. prescribed.

This first practical application of the theory of public works, which had long been contemplated favorably by economists, had two major objectives: The creation of useful work at equitable wages to relieve unemployment and the establishment of sorely needed improvements in the equipment of those services and facilities furnished the American people by its Federal, State, and municipal governments. The first objective of this new economic prescription was rapidly realized. Allocations of some $4,000,000,000 for public works materially reduced unemployment. The P. W. A. program provided work for hundreds of thousands of workers in the construction of projects, instigated a revival in the capital-goods industries through orders calling for the production, fabrication, and transportation of vast quantities of materials necessary for P. W. A. undertakings, and made its influence profoundly felt throughout the entire business structure by expanding vigorously the national buying power and creating a proportionate increase in the demand for consumers' goods. [Applause.]

In examining the recovering patient, observers have noted the beneficial results of P. W. A. treatment. Statisticians early this year estimated that P. W. A. had bolstered the national economy by providing approximately 10,300,000 man-months of employment in actual construction operations. Conservative economists are in agreement that direct employment creates at least the same amount of primary indirect employment in quarries, mines, and forests, in mills and factories, in transportation, and in all of those industries supplying raw and finished materials and transporting them to construction sites. Estimates of some statisticians run as high as five jobs created in indirect employment by every job in construction. Admittedly difficult of measurement is the effect of direct and primary indirect employment on those industries and professions satisfying the demand for consumers' goods and services. However, expanded pay rolls boost the national buying power and re-create a market for those commodities and services which a depression-pinched public has been denied in whole or in part. Statisticians believe that a fair figure in estimating the amount of secondary indirect employment resulting from the P. W. A. program would be 20,600,000 man-months of employment, a figure equal to the most conservative estimate of the total employment provided in P. W. A. construction and in supplying the materials for its program.

It might be recalled here that this first public-works program was concerned not only with putting men to work but with maintaining those high wage standards for which American labor had battled so long and so vigorously. To safeguard these wage standards so laboriously achieved, P. W. A. in all of its undertakings paid its workers the prevailing wage rate. P. W. A. not only maintained the high wage scales of which America is justly proud, but it sustained the morale of the American workmen by providing them with employment on undertakings of unquestioned social value.

It is this second objective of the P. W. A. program whose beneficial effects will be felt long after our unemployment crisis has passed and the great depression of the thirties is but a memory. Few of the many valiant attempts to break the depression will be remembered as long as that of P. W. A., because few of the emergency agencies created to speed the way to business recovery have so profoundly affected the future of the country.

Embracing every State, taking in 3,067 of the 3,073 counties in the country, reaching out into distant territories and possessions, P. W. A. has constructed some 23,700 projects to provide definite lasting services to the communities in which they were established. These undertakings, while byproducts of a plan to meet a national emergency, were designed to fill long-recognized social needs whose fulfillment had been delayed only by the lack of necessary funds. Built in time of an emergency, they became distinctive, enduring additions to America's national wealth. Practically every sizable community in the United States shared in the dual benefits of this program. The immediate need of providing employment of jobless workers was met, and men given work either in the construction of a project or in supplying materials for the undertaking. Beyond that the community gained a substantial, durable addition to its civic assets in the form of new utilities, new schools, or other establishments for public service. The stories of many of these undertakings are known to every schoolboy, to every newspaper reader in the land. The great dams in the West—Boulder, Fort Peck, Grand Coulee, and Bonneville—completed or inaugurated with public-works funds, have impressed the entire country by their magnitude and by their promise of service to hundreds of thousands of our people, but the significance of Boulder Dam is no greater than that of the smallest cross-roads schoolhouse, than the least pretentious water system constructed by P. W. A.

The provision of modern educational facilities for a half hundred farmers' children may definitely alter the course of their lives. The establishment of a pure-water supply to a community, which had lived in the constant dread of water-borne sickness, has its beneficial effect on public health more limited than that of the great dams in the number of individuals benefited, but of no less importance to the people of the community served.

In addition to financing some 15,500 undertakings of departments of the Federal Government, P. W. A. provided funds for and directed the construction of more than 8,000 projects proposed by States and lesser governmental bodies. The success of the program, the widespread acclaim that has attended the progress of P. W. A., was due in no small part to the fact that all of these non-Federal undertakings were initiated by the communities benefiting from them; and in each instance the people of the community backed their selection with hard cash by deciding to assess themselves locally for the major part of cost of the P. W. A. improvement. This automatically brought projects of unchallenged worth into the program, for P. W. A. undertook no work which did not enjoy complete local backing. No distant board or commission decided arbitrarily that such and such an improvement was needed by a community; the community itself, which was naturally in a position to know best its own needs, proposed the project and received Federal Government aid in carrying it out.

In non-Federal construction P. W. A. has financed some 2,800 utility projects—sewer and water systems, gas plants and electric-power systems, and waste-disposal plants. It has constructed upward of 3,000 educational buildings, spreading its funds for the establishment of necessary improvements in elementary and secondary schools, in colleges and universities, in libraries, and other educational institutions. The treatment of State and city wards has been substantially advanced. More than 350 hospitals and homes for the care of the sick, the insane, and the aged have been built and equipped in accordance with the standards of modern institutional practice. Nearly 1,000 undertakings, looking toward the improvement of transportation and the provision of further safeguards against accidents, have been financed with P. W. A. allocations. In addition to vast sums made available for a Federal road-building program, P. W. A. has provided funds for streets and highways, for grade separations, for viaducts and bridges, and for many other types of traffic improvements, ranging from the great Triborough Bridge and the Mid-Town Hudson Tunnel in New York to the grading of streets in small rural communities.

All of these undertakings stand as monuments on a battlefield which witnessed the rout of a major industrial depression by the agencies of a planned economy. They have fulfilled their major objective in creating 3 years' work for 3,000,000 jobless Americans. They have demonstrated the value of public works in a campaign against hostile economic forces and have shown an effective line of attack to be followed against depressions of the future. Built first as fortresses in a war against unemployment, they remain not merely as ornamental monuments of the P. W. A. program but as implements of service to the people of our own and future generations. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. I simply wish to say that I have listened with great interest to the gentleman's remarks. In the State of North Carolina the P. W. A. has been efficiently and economically managed. I regret it has received such a small share of the current appropriation for recovery and relief. When the new bill for the relief of unemployment comes in, I hope it will contain a definite sum for the P. W. A.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] for 10 minutes.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, much has been said from the well of this House concerning the reciprocal-trade agreement between the United States and Canada. Most of that which has been said has come from those across the aisle and many of the comments have been in opposition to the agreement in force since January 1 of this year. But what has been the comment in the editorial columns of the leading newspapers in the 48 States as to this trade agreement? It is shown from a study of editorials that the trade agreement between the United States and Canada has received the wholehearted commendation from all sections of the country. A survey made by the National Committee for Reciprocal Trade shows that from a total of 356 daily newspapers stepping into the field of comment editorially on this subject that 286 have commented most favorably upon this trade agreement and these newspapers, as I said previously, are daily papers which have without reservation endorsed the program, and among them are some with the largest circulation in Alabama, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Wisconsin, and the District of Columbia. A majority of the press in small towns of the United States likewise endorse the Canadian pact. Local and national gains are foreseen in New England, the middle Atlantic States, the South, and the leading agricultural States of the Middle West and West. The digest on this subject reveals that the revision of trade bearers under reciprocal-trade agreements are receiving editorially the widest comment. And who is there but taking a broad view of the question will not, at once, realize that it is impossible to live behind the wall of seclusion?

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks editorial comment from the Times, Tacoma, Wash., and the Record, of Philadelphia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Reserving the right to object, we are not permitted to put newspaper editorials in the RECORD, as the gentleman knows, and I will have to object.

Mr. RABAUT. Well, here is about what they say:

For years international trade has been dammed behind high tariff walls. That was bad because it increased prices of everything "protected" by tariff; prevented exports of surpluses and so reduced the national income; left transportation services without much to do. The whole world will be better off with a general lowering of the bars and a freer flow of products. (Times, Tacoma, Wash.)

It's hard to pull a tariff wall down because special interests cry "ruin" and the great mass of consumers who benefit are hard to mobilize. * * * Making this move in a world where trade is being strangled in a net of tariff and trade regulations is another major step toward recovery. (Record, Philadelphia, Pa.)

Who is there to deny the great benefits accruing to the automotive industry? Where is one so selfish as to fail to recognize the far-reaching benefits of employment created by the existence of the automotive industry, for it reaches into every nook and corner of the land? Indirectly it is the cause of the good roads that the farmers enjoy throughout the States of the Nation. The product of the industry has stepped into the very existence of our every activity, for we find the doctor upon the highway in his small car rushing to bring the pink infant into the world. We find the child of today in all kinds of weather being hurried to school along the highways of the country in the school busses of the land, and into the ramification of business we find it at every nook and turn. Truly the automotive industry and its product has been the modern blessing of America.

I come from Detroit, the city that cradled the automobile. I come from that city that beckoned to geniuses of the Nation to give to an awaiting public the perfect transportation it enjoys today. I said a moment ago who would deny the comeback that is now being enjoyed by the automotive industry, and the reciprocal-trade agreements will add further to its climbing of the ladder to its former position of supremacy.

MOTOR INDUSTRY A GREAT BENEFIT TO ENTIRE COUNTRY

The extent to which the increasing prosperity of the motor industry is benefiting the entire country is best illustrated and made known by a survey of the materials which go into the manufacture of the automotive product. For the industry uses 75 percent of rubber imports, 70 percent of all plate glass manufactured, 57 percent of all malleable iron, 40 percent of the supply of leather for upholstering purposes, 40 percent of all mohair made, 40 percent of all lead, 30 percent of the nickel consumed, 20 percent of the American steel output, 15 percent of all aluminum, 13 percent of the Nation's cast iron, 13 percent of the country's tin, and 12 percent of the zinc output.

The automotive industry over and above this purchases yearly, I wish you gentlemen from the South in the cotton-growing States would listen to me now, 500,000 bales of cotton; and you who are interested in the pigment industry or paint manufacturing, 10,000,000 gallons of paint, 13,000,000 yards of upholstery cloth, 35,000,000 pounds of hair and padding, and while a car advancing in age takes on wrinkled fenders and antiquated form, and becomes the worse for wear, and is referred to in the vernacular of the streets as a hunk of tin, nevertheless the industry still consumes 500,000,000 board feet of lumber. Over and above that, the purchasers of automobiles step into the oil and gas business to the tune of 460,000,000 gallons of lubricating oil and 15,300,000,000 gallons of gasoline.

But, ladies and gentlemen of the House, this is only the beginning. Let us be mindful now for a moment of the benefit of the automotive industry to the shipping interests of the Nation, to the storage houses, to the processors and the handling charges, to the building industry forced from time to time to make expansions all over the Nation from the small one-car garage, the gas stations, the superstations in our great cities, the showrooms, garages, and factories. Further, consider the ribbons of concrete, the network of prepared roads, the widening of city thoroughfares, the reconstruction of building resulting from such widening, the electrical equipment commonly referred to as the stop-light system, and the augmentation of police personnel demanded for safe traffic regulation. Think of the clerical force that has entered into the giant industry, and I wonder what the effect of the buying power of this stupendous manpower is upon the agricultural market. There can be no doubt but that the come-back of this industry is a godsend to the Nation. Oh, it is true, Mr. Speaker. And here I wish to quote from the Milwaukee Journal:

Our high rates against Canada have not helped us but hurt us. No one speaks of the tariff of 1930 as having accomplished any good for the farmer or anyone else. * * * It brought reprisals from all over the world and deepened the depression. * * * The tariffs have not worked for the farmer, as we have heard from every farmers' gathering since the war. * * * The effort to revive trade is to be praised. We are facing the facts; we used to think we could have it both ways—put on high rates and not have our exports cut down. We have found that this barring out of the other fellow's goods is a game two can play at. Therefore we cut down restrictions to trade which have hurt both countries. Here is a blow struck at one of the causes of world depression.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RABAUT. No; I cannot yield. I am sorry the gentleman from Pennsylvania has refused consent to put these small newspaper comments in my remarks. It shows the Nation-wide comment on the principle of reciprocal-trade agreements and what they mean to this country. I was anxious for the purpose of conserving time that they be inserted rather than read.

In speaking with members of the Department of Commerce I had occasion to mention that I came from Detroit, and how quick they were to say how the unemployment problem of the Nation would pass from existence like a snowball in the noonday's summer sun were we but to find a new industry to parallel that of the automotive manufacturers. Not an industry of a competitive nature but one bringing forward something new, something appealing, something offering additional comfort, first, perhaps, to be regarded as a luxury, but finally to be accepted as a necessity to American advancement. That is what America craves; that is what America needs. My statement should be convincing to you Representatives from various parts of the Nation, causing recognition of the paramount place that the automotive industry holds in the commerce and trade of our country. And in the spirit that has dominated the industries I wish to say that the more your district receives from it the happier we are, for we wish a broad recovery and desire to be similarly considered by you in your attitude toward the reciprocal-trade agreements.

And what does the New York Times say on this point?—

The reciprocal trade treaty between the United States and Canada is the greatest single step toward the reduction of tariff barriers and away from economic nationalism that has been taken anywhere since the onset of the depression. As such it is not only a fine achievement in itself but a hopeful augury of a wider restoration of international trade and sanity. * * * There is no doubt that special interests, and those who shiver at the very word "imports", will attack this treaty. They began to do so even before they knew its terms. But if they get a serious hearing, it will only be because they succeed in distracting attention from the effects of the treaty as a whole. * * * Imports from Canada dropped from $503,000,000 in 1929 to $232,000,000 in 1934, or 54 percent. Exports from the United States to Canada dropped from $899,000,000 in 1929 to $302,000,000 in 1934, or 63 percent. The new treaty will help producers on both sides of the border to win back at least a substantial part of this lost trade.

And the Post, of New York, puts it in a manner to bring it forcibly home to us:

What would you think of a merchant who prepared for hard times by deliberately antagonizing his best customer? That is what the United States did in 1930. * * * With the depression already under way * * * the tariff bill drastically reduced American business with Canada, our best customer. * * * The decline in our sales to Canada was greater than the decline in our purchases from Canada. The Hawley-Smoot tariff and its aftermath was a disastrous demonstration of economic folly. It taught us that we cannot sell abroad unless we also buy abroad.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 5 additional minutes. I should like to ask him a question pertaining to the automobile industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. If the gentleman would extend his time a few minutes more, then I should like to ask him a question in reference to the importation of farm products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RABAUT. I would be glad to permit the gentleman to ask me some questions, providing he permits me to insert certain editorials into my remarks.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have no right to permit the gentleman to do that.

Mr. RABAUT. The gentleman himself made the objection.

Mr. RICH. But it is contrary to the rules.

Mr. RABAUT. For need I recall to Members from the agricultural districts that the workers in the automotive industry are the brothers in toil of the farmers of the several States; need it be for me to tell how many of these sons of toil lost their all in the depression, how the high barriers of protective tariff forced the manufacturers to establish factories in countries across the sea because of retaliatory measures resorted to by nations affected, resulting from the narrowness of our own protective policy and who suffered in the entire transaction—none other than the American workman of the industry, who finally recognized the fact that his workbench had been exiled across the sea. His job was gone, but the reciprocal-trade agreements are again tearing down the barriers and opening the avenues to world trade for the automotive industry; and the artisans, mechanics, and workers in the industry will not be unmindful of this helpful activity and sincere cooperation to assist both the industry and labor by the whole-hearted action of a Democratic administration.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to voice my deep appreciation as a Democratic Member of Congress to the Detroit News and to the able pen of that distinguished correspondent, Mr. Blair Moody, who in a series of articles brought forcibly to the readers of Michigan the Secretary of State's campaign to recapture American foreign trade by the reciprocal-trade agreements.

TARIFF-BARRIER PROVES LOSS TO MICHIGAN—RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS WILL BE A BLESSING

Michigan's export trade in 1929 was $355,300,000, by 1932 this volume had fallen to $48,933,000, a decline of 86.2 percent. The 1929 export trade reported $73 for each of Michigan's 4,842,000 population. The loss of the difference, namely, $306,367,000, comparing 1932 with 1929, meant a loss to each inhabitant of the State of $63. This drastic decline in export trade meant rigid curtailment in production. Increased unemployment dwarfed purchasing power and of necessity decreased consumption of agricultural products in the domestic market. The tie-up of agriculture and industry by this statement is brought forcibly to our attention. The trade agreement, on the other hand, will open up into every section of the country opportunity for both agriculture and industry so interdependent upon each other, and it is to be hoped that Michigan's domestic market, which absorbs the greater part of its products, will likewise take automobiles, prepared foodstuffs, and other manufactured products. The prosperity of industry takes no cognizance of district or section but depends to a greater or lesser degree upon the condition of industries in every other section, and the automotive industry being of such giant proportions has a relationship in this connection that must be recognized, for just as a depression, like the measles, spreads from industry to industry, from section to section, so, too, recovery is contagious and its germs of activity spread from area to area. City store, factory and office employment, and wages decline with farm income. Industrial cities like Detroit are barometers for rising and falling farm incomes. Industrial pay rolls in the last 2 years have risen in proportion to the increased incomes of farmers. But you have only one side of the picture. The farmers' prosperity depends upon the condition of industry, and in this connection the Secretary of Agriculture recently said:

Farmers of the United States will unquestionably gain from the increased exportation of manufactured products to Canada. Suppose that exports of these products are increased by $300,000,000—a conservative figure in view of our trade with Canada in the past—and that half of this amount, or $150,000,000, goes into pay rolls. This would mean definite and substantial gains in the cash income of farmers. Studies have shown that in the past an increase of $150,000,000 in United States factory pay rolls added from four to six million dollars to the income of farmers in each of such States as Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, Iowa, and Ohio.

The increases in farm income resulting thus indirectly from the Canadian agreement will accrue largely to the producers of livestock products—the very same groups that are concerned over the concessions on Canadian cattle, calves, cream, and cheese.

In other words, the Canadian agreement will bring substantial improvement in the domestic market for these products—an improvement that greatly outweighs the very slight disadvantage resulting from the limited quantity of imports of these products.

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say that the reciprocal-trade agreements, boiled down to facts, makes an appeal to each and every one of us because of our united interest for relief of the unemployment situation of this Nation. I say that, boiled down to the facts, it spells one controlling sentence: Employment for the unemployed. In all the industries that I have mentioned to you in the course of my remarks, whether they be in the North, the South, the East, or the West, whether it be in the fields, in the mines, or the factories, or upon the highways of the Nation, it assists in that which we hope to relieve, the unemployment situation of the Nation. And in that spirit in which we are united, I leave these facts with you for your further consideration, which I hope will be favorable, and may the kindest feeling be engendered for the reciprocal-trade agreements which are being worked out under the present administration. The automobile workers of my district of necessity are deeply interested, but I have presented the matter to you on a broad scale. I have tried to show its benefits to the agriculture market. I have shown that the press is favorable to this praiseworthy activity of this administration. I feel it will work out as planned and that the barriers of trade being removed, we may progress along more free lines in the spirit of peace and tranquillity and in the attitude of a good neighbor with the peoples of the world. [Applause.]

AREAS BETWEEN SHORE AND BULKHEAD LINES IN RIVERS AND HARBORS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3071, providing for the placing of improvements on the areas between the shore and bulkhead lines in rivers and harbors, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3071, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. GAVAGAN, Mr. FIESINGER, Mr. SEGER, and Mr. CARTER.

RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS IN ALLEGHENY COUNTY, PA.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a bill which I have introduced on the matter of relief.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the bill to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution introduced by me:

Joint resolution

Resolved, etc., That due to the emergency existing in Allegheny County, Pa., as a result of the floods, county funds available from taxation are so impaired throughout the flood area that a continued support of the constructive activities of this county will be impossible. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in cooperation with local agencies in Allegheny County, to employ such county extension agents necessary to aid in quickly and adequately rehabilitate this flood-devastated area.

Sec. 2. That for the purpose of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000,000 to carry out the program of relief to these flood sufferers.

GOOD GOVERNMENT REQUIRES SOUND BUSINESS PRACTICES

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address which I delivered over the radio on March 17 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks I include the following address which I delivered over the National Broadcasting System on Tuesday evening, March 17, 1936, at 10:45 p. m.:

Ladies and gentlemen, as the political campaign approaches our people expect to have news concerning public affairs. Because they are busy in their respective lines of endeavor, it is impossible for them to give detailed consideration to the many phases of Federal legislation, not to mention the maze of administrative regulations going out from Washington to guide, and in many cases to arbitrarily direct, the conduct of our citizens throughout the country.

Formerly news reporters contacted the principal executive officers of the Federal Government about important matters of current interest. Now each permanent and temporary branch of the Government has a large staff of high-salaried press and propaganda writers who flood the country with thrilling stories about the magic wonders of this administration. It is no exaggeration to say that more propaganda has been released from Washington in the last 3 years, at the expense of the taxpayer, than in the preceding 150 years of our Government; so it cannot be expected that infrequent statements made by critics can equal those of this "self-admiration society", sometimes known as the Roosevelt administration. How these journalists must laugh and chuckle when they send out his "baloney."

There are two schools of thought in Washington—one which seeks to solve all our problems through the creation of new bureaus, commissions, and corporations owned by the Government. This borders on socialism. The other, the Republicans, who contend that our problems can be cured only by the old and tried American plan of persons or private organizations. One, political jobs; the other, private employment.

Should the employment of your children be based upon political influence; will you force them to go into the political begging business in order to find positions; will their future always be harassed with the uncertainty of employment as the political pendulum may swing either way? Or, may they enjoy security and happiness through their own merit and worth? The next election may decide this question for many years to come.

PUBLIC DEBT

It is interesting, although disheartening, to recall that when the Roosevelt administration took office, the public debt was, in round figures, $20,000,000,000 less credits, now it is definitely $31,000,000,000 less credits, an increase of $11,000,000,000 in just 3½ years. But our Democratic friends say this could not be prevented, as they have an acute case of "billionitis."

EMPLOYMENT

Now, about employment! Have you observed that we read voluminous propaganda about employment, with almost no mention of unemployment, or of those who were employed one week and discharged the next? Last week the American Federation of Labor stated that there are now 12,626,000 unemployed. Obviously, no New Dealer or anyone else can reconcile or justify these debt and unemployment increases.

TAXATION

I am sure you know that our source of revenue is taxes. Gold and silver may be juggled, or revalued, but taxes—to use a homely term—are the result of sweat. If our people could be made tax-conscious, public officials would be held to account for the sums they so generously scatter and waste. He who buys a pack of cigarettes knows about part of the tax he pays. The same is true of gasoline; but the invisible tax on shoes, or food, is not listed. If we could know that from one-fifth to one-third of the amount paid for almost every commodity we buy is charged to taxes in some form, our people would rise in indignation and call for a hidden-tax accounting.

PARTNERS IN GOVERNMENT

Frequently our people do not associate public office with good business management. But you and I are partners, owning equal shares of stock in the greatest business concern in the world, our Government; and we should employ as managers those qualified, to insure success.

No one denies that a substantial portion of the tremendous sum spent by the present administration has been used to assist those in distress and to build needed public works. This money has not all been wasted; but as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, day after day I am obliged to listen to bureau chiefs who glibly ask for two hundred million for this, five hundred million for that, even requesting appropriations running into billions; but they rarely can give specific reasons to support their askings. With few exceptions, they have very little conception of their duties, virtually none have ever held public office, very few have held positions of importance in private life; they are theoretical and have no working knowledge of the machinery of our Government.

I hope I am not too partisan to pay my respects to the fine, splendid leaders of the opposition party; legislators who understand public affairs; and while we may not agree in several particulars, yet it is to be deplored that much of their sound advice and suggestions has been laid aside and replaced with the views of visionary appointees whose fantastic theories were adopted by the present administration. These fine, able men are perplexed and confused beyond expression.

FARM PROBLEM

As you listen to me, I feel sure you are inaudibly asking: What change do you propose? I answer, not only agriculture, but the entire country, will be benefited by protecting the American producer from the foreign competition of cheap land, cheap labor, cheap transportation. The home market, which consumes 90 to 95 percent of the products of our farms and factories, should be preserved.

The new farm program, as well as the old, seeks to reduce production by about one-fourth. A fair price for his products will benefit the farmer, who will have funds to purchase manufactured goods, thereby increasing employment in shops and factories. Normal conditions in this country will return only when the farm problem is solved.

Contradictory as it may appear, the President has allocated three-fourths of a billion dollars for irrigation and reclamation projects, to cost one and one-half billion dollars, which ultimately will bring into cultivation thousands of acres of land to compete against the farmers who are now being urged to restrict their farm crops. Thousands of mortgages were foreclosed on farms in the region where these new irrigated tracts are located, proving no need for additional farm land. As taxpayers, you are paying for these projects, and while the adverse effect may not be felt for several years, ultimately this additional production will cause another dislocation of agriculture.

Two important divisions of the Government working at cross-purposes: The Department of Agriculture urging restriction of farm products, the Department of the Interior promoting increased production. What could be more inconsistent? Such contradictory and unsound expenditures should be stopped.

To compare: These projects pay no interest for 10 years. If you owned a factory, or were employed in one, how would you like to have the Government erect a competing plant and make no interest charge for 10 years?

In this connection, I mention the well-known shelterbelt proposed by the President, a belt of trees to be 100 miles wide and 1,100 miles long, extending through a semiarid section from the Canadian line to the Gulf. Irrespective of party affiliation, this fiasco has been laughed out of existence. The humor of this silly, absurd project was fortunately appreciated in time to save more than $100,000,000.

The plan to restrict farm production about one-fourth will logically displace about the same percent of farm labor. How shall we reemploy these persons? They cannot be absorbed by industry, because industry now has too many millions unemployed.

I contend that we might greatly increase the production of beet sugar. We could supply three-fourths of the sugar which we use, now being imported. Also, we might encourage on a large scale the production of substitutes for rubber that now comes from lands which do not purchase our commodities.

Another definite field which might be quickly utilized: If the importation of petroleum products and blackstrap molasses were practically prohibited, surplus grain and waste farm material, such as cornstalks and straw, could be made into fuel alcohol and gainfully employ many of our people.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

I can only briefly mention another highly important subject.

The Republican Party for many years has followed the policy of placing import duties on foreign-produced articles, if competitive, but even now two-thirds of all imports are on the "free" list. This policy is based on the thought that we should protect our people against the cheap labor of the rest of the world.

Wages in England are about one-third the scale paid here; in France and Germany slightly less; and the remainder of Europe about one-fourth. In the Latin States below us, the wage level is probably one-fifth that paid here; in China and Japan the wage for unskilled labor is from 15 to 25 cents per day. Many of these countries are purchasing our improved machinery, and their production equals our manpower. Oriental imports are constantly increasing.

Mr. American, how do you like to compete against these low-wage earners?

The Republican Party seeks to protect our factory workers and farmers from too severe competition of foreign labor. Do you believe in this policy, or do you prefer to have the "free-traders" handle your international trade agreements?

The Democrats have always sharply criticized this policy. While they lacked the courage to repeal the last Republican tariff act, although their leaders have repeatedly threatened to do so, through piecemeal reciprocal treaties they are effecting the same results.

For example, when the United States negotiates a reciprocal treaty with nation A, every tariff reduction in favor of nation A can be likewise exercised by all nations having treaties with us.

So, possibly with one exception, every nation gets the concession made to nation A, and other countries are not in turn obliged to make any concessions to us. I submit, a boy trading marbles could not be hoodwinked into such an unequal agreement.

This illustrates the lack of business capacity shown by our State Department, now under control of an outspoken free-trade or low-tariff advocate. The facts are that when our good Democratic diplomats see a few silk hats and highly colored spats they just cannot take their eyes off these alluring objects, and, of course, the astute foreign agent walks away with a fine trade bargain—at the expense of the American people.

It is obvious that if we had followed Democratic advice and reduced or eliminated duties upon foreign products, we would have many more millions of people out of employment.

REVERSED POLICIES

The Democratic Party has abandoned almost everything they ever advocated. Their members speak in whispers when States' rights are mentioned. After opposing the protective-tariff principle for decades, they now hesitate to discuss their dear old phantom, free trade; they positively bolt under the table when anyone mentions another one of their international "pets", the League of Nations, and say they never heard of it.

Two laws enacted and then repealed by the New Deal were the Economy Act and the law fixing a tax of 45 cents a bushel on potatoes. Then the shelterbelt 100 miles wide by 1,100 miles long has been abandoned. It is also highly impolite to mention either of these three orphans in administration circles.

If we had joined the League of Nations, today we would be embroiled in all the controversies in Europe, of which we know little and care less; and American mothers now would be fearful of our entry into another world war. At this time the President has a so-called Ambassador at Large flitting from capital to capital in Europe, and, according to the press, mixing in Old World affairs. He does not hold a position created by law and should be immediately recalled.

With few exceptions, all of the leaders of the Democratic Party were in favor of our entering the League of Nations. Americans have repudiated this dictator-royalist league, but it would be interesting to know how many of the leaders of that party at this time still favor this course.

If there was a law to permit a political party to be sued for alimony on account of desertion or nonsupport, our good opponents would be obliged to purchase barrels, as it would take their clothing and other possessions to pay these court bills.

But the Democrats have surely maintained a consistent policy in two respects: For the past 70 years, without exception, they have always increased the public debt when in control. They have been generous in promoting the importation of foreign-produced commodities. They surely do take care of our foreign relations.

In fairness, I should say there is one thing which our good Democratic friends have never deserted. I mention the Treasury of the United States. How they do love this dear old Treasury! If walls could speak, this fine old building undoubtedly would tell a tale of poverty and exhaustion. But the old edifice cannot be lonesome these days, because it is just across the street from the White House.

However, they have furnished us with some diversion. It is said that some well-intentioned person recently addressed a serious communication to the "Superintendent of Chats, Fireside Department, Washington, D. C." I assume it was referred to the boondoggling division.

Please remember that it will require the blood and sweat of the "sons and daughters of the Democrats" to pay these debts, as well as toil and privation on the part of the "children of the Republicans." It will take long and bitter years of sacrifice to balance this account.

We are not unmindful of our duty to those justly entitled to assistance, but public funds should not be absorbed in useless political jobs.

Every red-blooded American enjoys a clean, fair fight, whether on the football field or in the arena. He abhors vote-buying or political bribery. The Republicans challenge the opposition to lay aside unfair political pressure and to stage a fair, open contest.

In conclusion, this America of ours is the finest heritage ever handed down to a people, and you and I have the right to insist on sharing in the wonderful advantages brought to us through this form of government.

In addition, we owe it to our dependents and ourselves to fight to retain these American principles.

The welfare of your family, and of your country, is at stake. How will you vote?

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, first let me say to my colleague from Michigan [Mr. RABAUT] that I did not object to his putting into his remarks the newspaper editorials because of any feeling I have about him, but I regard it the duty of every Member of Congress to keep newspaper articles out of the RECORD; this is a record of Congress, not a record of newspaper editorials.

I call the attention of the House to what reciprocal-trade agreements are doing to the farmers of this country. In 1935 there were imported into the country 4 times as much wheat as was imported in 1934, 14 times as much corn, twice as much oats, 22 times as much butter, 75 times as much beef, and 30 times more pork, double the amount of wool, and the same holds true of a great many other farm commodities. That is what the reciprocal-trade agreements are doing to the farmers of our Nation. Is it helping the American farmer? The same holds true of many manufactured articles.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, in my address this morning there were some extracts objected to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]. I explained to the gentleman from Pennsylvania what the extracts amounted to, and he has consented to withdraw his objection. I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks to include those extracts.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know what blandishments the gentleman from Michigan has used on the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but meantime I will have to object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I understand there is some possibility of my getting through to Johnstown and other parts of my district that have been devastated by the flood. I ask unanimous consent to be excused from the sessions of the House until I return.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 2625. An act to extend the facilities of the Public Health Service to seamen on Government vessels not in the Military or Naval Establishments; and

S. 3978. An act relating to taxation of shares of preferred stock, capital notes, and debentures of banks while owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and reaffirming their immunity.

TO AMEND FOURTH SECTION OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT
Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 435.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 435

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 3263, a bill to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4). That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 5 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

I yield myself 8 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I prefer to make my statement in the 8 minutes without being asked to yield.

This resolution comes from the Committee on Rules and provides for the consideration of H. R. 3263, known as the Pettengill bill, relative to long and short hauls on railroads. There has been considerable interest expressed in this bill, both in the last session and in this session. The report comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, practically unanimous, asking that we have consideration of the bill at this session of Congress.

The rule provides for 5 hours of general debate, the debate to be confined to the bill, and it is a wide-open rule, open for all amendments.

As to the merits of the legislation, as the hearing before the Rules Committee developed, it is the feeling on the part of the railroad managements, as well as all of the brotherhoods, that an amendment of the Interstate Commerce Act relative to long- and short-haul rates should be made. It is largely a matter of procedure. Heretofore, in order to establish a lower rate for a longer haul over the same line, the railroads had to file a petition with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in many instances the hearings were carried out for several years. Under this bill the railroads will be allowed to publish this lower rate for a longer haul over the same railroad, where they come in competition with other lines of transportation. Then if any shipper feels aggrieved or the Interstate Commerce Commission on its own initiative desires to suspend that rate until a full hearing is had, it may be done. It does not repeal the provisions of the long- and short-haul clause, but it does provide for this procedure which will speed up decisions.

The railroads are seeking a basis of fair competition with water transportation and with bus and truck lines that are now carrying freight. As long as those competing lines of transportation are not under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, by having their rates fixed, and until that time comes, which many who are interested in all lines of transportation on a fair basis of competition believe should come, it is the opinion of myself and many others in the House that the railroads should be allowed to enter into this competition at a lower rate on a longer haul. The railroads of our nation have about $26,000,000,000 invested. The water transportation, intercoastal, has about $85,000,000. In times of war and emergency, the country must depend upon our railroad transportation. That was demonstrated during the World War. The railroads are now beginning to show a profit and coming out of the debit balance, and we believe they ought to have an opportunity to increase their volume of traffic. After all, the railroads with that investment, have certain fixed charges or overhead that must be met. The profits or returns will then come with the volume of business that is developed. In developing that additional volume of business on these transcontinental hauls, we believe the permanency of the railroad systems will be preserved. We know we must have railroad systems. We know that if they do not show a profit, at some future time they will have to be taken over by the Government. For myself, I prefer to put them in a self-sustaining position, where they can yield a profit.

Some will believe that on a comparative basis it is unjust to allow a lower freight rate on a longer haul than on a shorter one, but I do not believe this will raise the domestic rates or intermediate rates. I believe that by increasing the volume of business of the whole railroad structure, so that a profit is shown in the operation of the whole system, the Interstate Commerce Commission can then mark down the rates, and I believe they will do so, even on the shorter hauls. It is my opinion we ought to do that in order to give them a volume of business so that they can show a profit, so that the Interstate Commerce Commission will reduce the rates on freight traffic, the same as they have recently done on passenger traffic.

In 1920 the railroads employed 1,600,000 employees. Somewhere about half of that number is now employed, and with the increasing transcontinental freight haul we believe that many employees will be added. The railroads should have some consideration for their life. They are probably the greatest single taxpayers in the United States. There is not a county, not a State, not a municipality but what levies taxes upon the physical valuation of their properties. They contribute to the schools; they contribute to the highways over which their chief competitor operates.

I believe the railroads deserve this consideration to give this basis of fair competition with water-borne transportation and with busses and trucks. I have nothing, of course, against these lines; but bear in mind, as I said before, they are not under the regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission so as to have their rates fixed. Until this time comes the railroads, I think, should be given this privilege of fixing these rates on these longer hauls.

I believe all of us will want to see at least the rule passed so that we can have full discussion for 5 hours on the bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The provisions of this bill do not make it mandatory on the Commission; they can use their discretion; they can change the rates.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman is correct; the Commission can change the rates, determine questions of discrimination and questions of proper return and compensation. These are all preserved. It is largely a question of procedure.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Is it not true that the Interstate Commerce Commission can act on this matter now?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes; I thought I made that plain. I will say to my friend from Oregon they can act, but the railroads must petition and wait for a long-drawn-out hearing. It will change the procedure so these rates can be fixed immediately. Then any shipper can file complaint with the Commission on its own initiative and ask for a change of the rates.

Mr. PIERCE. That is the object of it, to shift the burden of proof to the shipper, and it is impossible for him to get into court.

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; the gentleman is in error. The burden of proof still lies with the railroad companies.

Mr. PIERCE. That is the crux of the bill, the shifting of the burden of proof.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Not at all. The burden of proof does not shift from the railroads.

Mr. PIERCE. But the shipper cannot get into court.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. The gentleman referred to benefits for labor and relief of unemployment. Does the gentleman think the granting of this low rate to the Pacific coast is going to restore to jobs all the idle railway men in this country? Has it not been shown by testimony that in spite of increased tonnage on some of the railroads employment of labor has decreased because of the longer trains that are hauled?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I think it will help relieve unemployment, but, of course, I cannot say to what extent.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. We have had a Coordinator of Railroads in this country for some years, Mr. Eastman. He did not testify before the subcommittee on this bill, but it is my understanding he did appear before the Rules Committee. I am wondering if the gentleman would like to give us the benefit of Mr. Eastman's views?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I heard much of Mr. Eastman's testimony. It would take quite a little time to go into that. I would rather put that off until general debate.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. I thought the gentleman might be able to tell us briefly the substance of his recommendations.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There are others who heard his testimony too and I feel sure they will go into it in general debate.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. No record, of course, was made of the hearing before the Rules Committee.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I make it a rule never to commit myself on any legislative proposal until I think I know something about it. This bill, however, constitutes an exception to that rule. I shamefully confess to you that in response to the appeal of my railroad labor friends, and others in the service of the railroads, I did commit myself to the support of this rule and the bill; and I intend to vote for the rule. When I made this commitment I was under the impression that the bill was in the public interest. I am now convinced, Mr. Speaker, that it is not. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman let me proceed for a few moments?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. COX. As I say, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the bill except a promise of increased traffic for the railroads at the expense of water carriers and a promise of increased railroad employment at the expense of those now employed by the carriers by water.

The purpose of this bill, and make no mistake about it, is to kill off the water-borne commerce of this country. There will not be created an additional carload of traffic as a result of the adoption of the bill. There will not be made a single job for a single laborer. There will be a shifting, as I have stated, of freight from the carriers by water to the rail carriers and there will be a shifting of labor now engaged in handling water-borne commerce to those engaged in carriage by rail, but labor is going to be disappointed at the small number of increased railroad employees.

If the policy Congress has heretofore pursued—that is, of fostering, encouraging, and building up water transportation—was sound and ought not to be abandoned, then this bill is bad. If what we have done in the way of improving water transportation in the interest of low freight rates or low transportation charges, if what we have done in this regard has been wise, then this bill, Mr. Speaker, ought to be killed.

The question propounded by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE], I believe it was, just before I took the floor is entirely pertinent. The gentleman from Oregon directed the attention of the House to the effect of this legislation, which is most desired by the railroads. In other words, the purpose of the bill is in part to take the rail carriers from under the strict supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Under the bill which the rule is intended to make in order, the railroads are to be licensed to make and file their own rates without first obtaining leave of the Commission, and then if some interested party should file complaint, or if the Commission itself and of its own accord intervenes, the rates may be suspended and the roads called upon to prove the reasonableness of the charges made.

The Rayburn bill, which Mr. Eastman has on two different occasions approved, is germane as an amendment to the Pettengill bill. The Rayburn bill goes as far in the giving of relief to the rail carriers as they ought to demand, because under that bill before the rail carrier can change its rates in the interest of the seaboard and against the interior areas of the country, it must make application to the Commission and obtain leave.

Effort has been made in the propaganda that has been carried on in behalf of this bill to create the belief that no relief has as a rule been granted by the Commission to the railroads under section 4 of the Transportation Act; but as between 1930 and 1935 there were 150 cases filed and in 120 of them the relief was granted and in most instances granted upon the filing of the application pending hearing.

If someone with a prior right to offer the Rayburn bill, which is the bill that has been approved by Mr. Eastman on two different occasions, does not offer it as a substitute for the Pettengill bill, I will offer it myself. Certainly it ought to be offered in the interest of proper regulation and the public.

Mr. Speaker, what the railroads want is freedom to return to old conditions where the practice so outraged public sentiment as to demand and bring about the enactment of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and later strengthened by making the long- and short-haul provision effective. I challenge any Member of this body to justify upon moral grounds the charging of a higher rate for the transportation of freight over the same road going in the same direction 100 miles than is charged for carrying it 1,000 or 2,000 miles. What the roads want, I repeat, is freedom of action in order that they may kill off the water carriers of the country. There is no requirement in the law that they fix a rate which will give a fair return, but, on the contrary, they are at liberty to carry the freight for less than cost, and they will take it on that basis if such practice will result in the destruction of that instrumentality that Congress has created and has fostered because of the influence that it has upon transportation charges.

Mr. Speaker, if the railroads and labor want relief, let them come in here with a proposal to put interstate carriers under strict regulation, supervised by the Interstate Commerce Commission. As far as I am personally concerned, I am for putting busses, trucks, and all of the common carriers, including water carriers, under strict regulation. That ought to be done; it would protect labor and the rail carriers—and I favor giving both this kind of protection. My chief objection to the Pettengill bill is that it permits the rail carriers to change rates without first obtaining leave from the Commission. There is as much in the Rayburn bill for labor as there is in the Pettengill bill, and it should prevail over the Pettengill bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, there is a good deal of misapprehension as to what existing conditions with reference to long-haul and short-haul legislation are and also what the effect of this bill will be. As the preceding speaker has stated, a railroad may charge more for a direct haul or may charge less for a direct haul than the sum of the rates of the intermediate points if the Interstate Commerce Commission says it is a proper and justifiable case. But the present law states that if such a rate is desired by a railroad it shall file an application. If the Interstate Commerce Commission, by applying its rules with respect to the rate-making structure, thinks there is justification for the rate, the rate is granted. As has been said, 150 such applications during a recent period were filed by the railroads; 120 of them were granted, and 30 were denied or are still pending. That is liberal treatment to the railroads with respect to exceptions to this general rule of not charging less for a greater distance of haulage.

Mr. Speaker, what the railroads desire and what would be effected by this bill is about as follows: The railroads need not in each instance justify their rates. They file them, and unless objection is made from some source the rate automatically goes into effect. It is the same proposition as before, only it puts upon the shipper, it puts upon the little communities, it puts upon the water carriers, the duty or necessity of hiring lawyers and engaging in intensive research in order to make out in the first instance a case against the proposed rate. Then the railroads defend their rates.

Of course it has been said, and will be repeated later, that the burden of proof for justification of the rates still rests with the railroads, but the difficulty is that the little fellows at these hundreds of intermediate points have not the resources nor the money to fight the railroads in the first instance before the Interstate Commerce Commission. The railroads are entitled to this treatment today, and they can get it, but they have to show they are entitled to it and not force some little factory, some little community, or some local market to go to heavy and unnecessary expense in order to protect themselves against an injustice on the part of the railroads.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Would the railroads file an increased rate if this bill is passed?

Mr. COX. Might they file an increased rate? Why certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman mean for intermediate points?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Under the Pettengill bill is not the object the filing of a lower rate for long hauls?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Why certainly.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They cannot file a higher rate under this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. For long hauls?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Yes; for long hauls?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They can.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They cannot increase the short-haul rate?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That would not be affected by this particular provision.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. They cannot increase the rate for the short hauls, can they?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They could under this bill.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Under this bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They could.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I understand from the author of the bill they cannot. The only thing they can do is to file a lesser rate for the longer haul.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes; but they can file a rate for anywhere under the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. No. I understand they cannot increase the rate for the shorter hauls.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They may have their application reviewed and considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Of course, it would not go into effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission gave its approval.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not believe the gentleman is correct in his statement with reference to raising intermediate rates.

Mr. LEHLBACH. They can file such a rate, which then would be subject to approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PIERCE. Does not the rate have to be compensatory now, and would not the repeal of this clause make it so that it would not have to be compensatory? In other words, they can file a rate so low that it will wipe out competition, whereas now they have to show that they are not losing money on the traffic.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Unless the Interstate Commerce Commission—

Mr. PIERCE. Unless the Commission sees fit to modify the fourth section.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Unless the Interstate Commerce Commission should take notice itself and act on its own motion, which is unusual, it would necessitate, if the rates were not compensatory, or if the rate were not within reason and justice, a little shop or a little factory or a little shipper along the line to hire lawyers, make research, and establish a prima facie case.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield in order that I may ask the author of the bill at this point to point to the part of the bill that prevents an increase of rates?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I can point that out.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask the author of the bill that question.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I should prefer not to yield for that purpose now.

It has been stated that this would be beneficial to railroad labor by increasing employment. Proponent after proponent of this bill has argued before various committees that this bill would not increase the cost of railroad operation, because the excess traffic or the excess freight carried could be carried on existing trains or by the lengthening of existing trains without increasing unduly the cost of operation of the railroads, which means that they can put this into effect without hiring any more men. So the idea which has been drilled into the railroad employees that this is going to be of substantial benefit to them is entirely an illusion.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. COX. I should like the gentleman to yield for the purpose of making inquiry of the author of the bill if there is anything in the legislation that prevents a road from filing increased rates.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I should prefer that to be done not in my time.

Mr. COX. The question was raised here, and it appears there is some doubt about it, although I insist there is none.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WITHROW. The gentleman says this would not benefit the railroad employee. Does not the gentleman think the railroad employee and his representatives are better judges of that than is the gentleman? [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am having to pass judgment on it, and I have to exercise my own judgment when I advocate or oppose legislation in this House. There are probably hundreds of thousands of people who know more about every subject that comes up here than I do, but, after all, it is my opinion that is to be translated into a vote. [Applause.]

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. I should like to call attention to the Record of 1934, on March 1, where the testimony of the Southern Pacific officials is quoted to the effect that they could carry 33 1/3 percent extra traffic west and 15 percent east without increasing their mileage, their trains, or their employees.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Precisely; that is just the point I was trying to make. In order to get the support of their labor for this bill they are fooling their labor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Is it not a fact that there has never been a hearing on this bill before the entire Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and that this ill-advised legislation, about which there seems to be so much difference among its sponsors, comes in here with a rule adopted by a majority of one in the Rules Committee?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not care to say what the majority was in the Rules Committee.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from New Jersey 5 more minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The question was asked, What was the attitude of Mr. Eastman, the Coordinator of Railroads, toward this bill? If it is of any importance to you gentlemen, or if it has any influence with you, let me tell you that Mr. Eastman and the Interstate Commerce Commission unanimously opposed this bill. [Applause.]

Now, there is talk that water transportation is subsidized and therefore the railroads should be given unconscionable advantage in competing with or driving out the water competition. Of course, when it comes to subsidies, the only water transportation that is actually subsidized are the ships engaged in foreign commerce, and, of course, the railroads do not compete with ships in overseas traffic.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Let me finish this statement.

It is said, however, that the rivers and harbors are improved at public expense and that the Panama Canal was constructed at public expense, and evidence is offered to show how transportation by water through the Panama Canal has cut down the transcontinental transportation business of the railroads. Well, for heaven's sake, is there any sense in the proposition that in order to procure cheap transportation the United States spends hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars to afford opportunity for such cheap transportation by water to its shippers and then enacts legislation to put the transportation system that it has thus created out of business? Are we going to dig the Panama Canal and then pass legislation to allow the railroads to make the Panama Canal useless by transporting at a loss from the Atlantic to the Pacific overland and then soaking the little shippers of the inland localities throughout the country to make up this loss?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman contend that the barge line on the upper Mississippi River, with all its expense of maintaining channels, does not constitute an outright gift?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not care anything about the barge line on the upper Mississippi River; that is an entirely different question.

Mr. KNUTSON. It is interwoven with this question.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The improvement of waterways for the benefit of shippers in order to get low transportation is one thing. The barge line has nothing to do with it and is not interwoven with this.

Mr. KNUTSON. The Government has appropriated money as gratuities for it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am not talking about that; this is an entirely different question.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is it not a fact that the transcontinental railroads were subsidized by the Government at the time they were built by land grants?

Mr. LEHLBACH. They were. Now, I want to say that the bus and truck transportation are under the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is inevitable that within a short time our water transportation will be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We had better wait and let the Interstate Commerce Commission, with jurisdiction over all kinds of transportation, regulate these matters than to pass a bill which the Interstate Commerce Commission, and almost everyone who has studied the subject, is opposed to. [Applause.]

Mr. SADOWSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield.

Mr. SADOWSKI. Can the gentleman tell us any form of transportation that is tied down by law as the railroad system is?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. I am sorry. My time has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, there is not a man in this House on either side or of any party that does not approve of fair play. The bill you are going to have, or that you have under this rule, is nothing more or less than fair play. [Applause.]

They talk about taking business away from the poor water carriers and turning it over to the railroads, about giving preference to the railway laborers who are going to handle it, as an unfair imposition on our water transportation system and laborers. This bill does nothing of the kind. Water transportation can charge more for a short haul than a long haul. It is only giving railway labor an equal opportunity to work. This bill is taking nothing from any other type of labor to which it is justly entitled. If you believe in competition, why not put all these instrumentalities of transportation on the same plane.

The gentleman who spoke here a moment ago says, "let us put them all under the Interstate Commerce Commission." That is all right. I am with him on that, but why not put them on the same plane now, so that when they go under the Interstate Commerce Commission we will not have to be bothered with this unfair differentiation. The railroads of the country are the largest employers of labor of any organization in the United States. They represent $26,000,000,000 worth of taxable property, and in some communities they are paying over half the taxes, while endeavoring to survive, buy material, meet pay rolls, and pay dividends. They pay their labor the highest wage of any similar employer in the country, and yet we hold their hands and let their competitors pick their pockets. If that is fair play, if that is free competition, then I know nothing about it.

We have built the Panama Canal. We have subsidized airways, built concrete highways, and operate power transmission lines. We have permitted power companies to ship coal by wire over and through mountains and hills, and pipe lines to do the same with oil, and they can charge any rate they want to and get away with it. The railroads that are operating something that pays dividends, that hold the investment of trust funds, that protect insurance companies, that are the very backbone of our financial structure, you tie down and prevent from protecting themselves.

Some gentlemen here, one sitting in front of me, a good friend of mine, is much disturbed by some of the railway activities and things that occurred 50 years ago in the railroad business. That was long before the Interstate Commerce Commission was in operation and before the railroads had any competition. Anything that the railroads would do under this proposed bill would still be under the surveillance of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

If the railroads today were to discriminate against any community, competition would soon correct the evil. The gentleman just said that they could haul freight at a loss. The question as to reasonable return is always before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and with this in view any proposed rate must be considered.

Under the present law, under the conditions as they exist today, a railroad can put in a rate allowing a larger compensation for a shorter haul than for a longer haul, and after it has put it in, if anybody protests, then the matter is held on for hearing indefinitely. There is no time placed for a hearing at all, and the railroads cannot proceed while the matter is pending for hearing. Under the bill before us the law controlling the railroads for short haul and long haul will be the same as every other provision pertaining to railroad rates in the Interstate Commerce Act.

In other words, when the railroads post their rates giving a larger charge for a short haul than for a long haul, the matter will be published, and then if an objection is filed the matter is to be heard within 7 months by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is essentially the difference of time involved in changing a rate between 7 months and an indefinite time. That is the main question involved here in this bill. In other words, under this bill you could not tie up the railroads longer than 7 months in changing a rate. The water carrier, the pipe-line company, the power company, and the trucks and airplanes will continue to have a tremendous advantage even if we pass this bill, but I submit, in the interest of fair play, we ought to give the railroad a part of an even break once. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER].

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, some question arises as to the attitude of the Interstate Commerce Commission on this pending measure. I shall give to the House the language of Coordinator Eastman, who is one of the Commissioners, with reference to disturbing the long- and short-haul clause of the Transportation Act:

We are unable to understand how the public interest would be served by the enactment of such a bill. Experience has shown during the years before and since the enactment of the act in 1887 that special measures are necessary to prevent a peculiar form of undue discrimination which may be created by the establishment of higher rates for shorter than for longer distances. Section 4 was designed to protect the public against this special kind of prejudice and discrimination.

In the language of the proponents of this bill, it just does not amount to anything, but I say that when you find the railroad interests of this country supporting a measure, before you make up your mind you had better ascertain that it does not amount to anything. The change of procedure alone, which is at least admitted by the proponents of this bill, is sufficient, in my opinion, to destroy the recaptured commerce on the improved inland waterways of the Nation. We are not going to disagree in our views as to the valuable contribution to our economic structure that is made by cheap transportation. That is the purpose of the declaration of policy in the Waterways Act, which provides for the development and promotion of waterway transportation in order to guarantee to the shippers of the country a cheap method of transporting their products, and we cannot discharge the obligation that we owe to the citizens of the Nation unless we make available to them the cheapest possible transportation, it matters not whether that transportation be by railroad, by truck, by bus, or by water-borne commerce. I remain in no doubt of the fact that we are witnessing in this attitude on the part of the railroad interests of the country an effort to open the door to a return of the outrages perpetrated in the intermountain country and noncompetitive interior points which caused a war of 20 years to be waged in order to secure in the Transportation Act a guaranty against the abuses which then prevailed.

I give this House this further warning: This bill is laying down a predicate on which the railroads are preparing to wage war on the competitive transportation agencies, and they are going to make the interior pay again the expense of that undertaking. [Applause.]

Of course, no one can defend the former practice now prohibited by declaration of positive law, of charging more for a short haul than they charge for a long haul. They destroyed cities, when unregulated, through that practice, and they built cities, under their indiscriminate, reckless operation during that period of time. When you say we tie the hands of these transportation agencies, we say we tie them because of the practice of the railroad companies then. Can we now place greater confidence in that same operation, so long as they are moved by the same men in the counting house in the larger cities of your Nation, whose policy is now and ever has been the greatest charge that the traffic will bear?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. No. They are going back to it. Have we any reason from the lights before us today to believe they have reformed? We recall the time when they had flocks of paid lobbyists in the capital cities of the States of this Nation purchasing and directing your legislatures, dictating the regulations that applied to their own operation. From the lights before us they are ready to engage again, when their own selfish interests may be involved, in just exactly a similar character of conduct. Of course, if there is nothing in this bill, the railroads would not be behind it and pressing it with the vigor they are displaying.

Now, we have developed some waterways in this Nation. We have built great terminals in many of the cities. We have expended millions of dollars to develop the great arteries of commerce that Nature has provided; but we have been more indifferent to those potential values than any other nation on the face of this earth. Why? Because we permitted the railroads, in their ruthless enterprise, in order to build and continue a monopoly in transportation, to sweep the equipment from the waterways; and we are just now recapturing some small part of that lost tonnage. We might as well tear down all of the work we have performed on the great Ohio River, with its 60 dams and perfect channel; on the Illinois River, so recently opened, over which today there floats tonnage from the great industrial areas of that State at a rate at which the railroads cannot carry the traffic. [Applause.]

Much is said of discriminations inflicted upon the railroads through the inequalities existing in competitive agencies. One of them is that the trucks and busses are permitted to operate over the highways without paying a reasonable cost for the use. The highways were constructed for the convenience of that same public which is entitled to the lowest reasonable rate for the transportation of its necessities and the establishment and utilization of such low-cost transportation was in the exercise of such privilege. It is now demonstrated that a connected and consistent development of the great arteries of commerce in our waterways is justified, and there will be no turning back until the job is complete. The justification for the existence of any transportation system lies in its ability to serve the interest of the public, and if it fails to measure to such requirement in that it is unable to render the service demands at a reasonable comparative cost, then it cannot be justified. In my opinion, the ultimate of the rate structure will be found in the policy of the cost of service plus a reasonable profit, and the future of railroad transportation will not hinge upon the ability to change the laws to enable discriminations to be practiced or to destroy competitive agencies, but will be solved when the exploiting banking control are willing to abandon the policy of "all the traffic will bear", sit about the board, and adjust their capital structure to conform to actual investment and values and thus provide a basis for a reasonable return thereon.

The President is opposed to the measure and quotes the criticism voiced by Coordinator Eastman, of the Commission, as follows:

After the changes in section 4 and because of the disappearance of the water lines, the Commission gradually compelled a revision of rates in southeastern territory which has very nearly eliminated fourth-section departures on direct routes. This gave the inland water lines a renewed chance to operate, and they have returned to a considerable extent more particularly on the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers. However, if the railroads were permitted to make competitive rates without restraint and regardless of the level maintained at intermediate, noncompetitive points, they probably could drive the water lines out of business again. The same thing might happen, to a considerable extent, with the trucks.

But if there should be restraints on competition, the question still remains whether a section 4, such as has existed since 1910, is necessary for this purpose. It is true that the Commission could exercise a very considerable measure of control under section 3 and its power to fix minimum rates, coupled with its power to suspend rate changes. However, the forms of discrimination against which section 4 is directed are particularly flagrant forms which tend to arouse acute public dissatisfaction. The history of the section and the fact that most States have similar provisions in their statutes, and sometimes even in their constitutions, is evidence that this is so. Section 4, as it has existed since 1910, gives the Commission a wider discretion and more flexible means of dealing with such discriminations and restraining the competition which gives rise to them than it would otherwise possess.

The National Grange, in a letter addressed to the Members of the House of Representatives on March 9, 1936, boiled the matter down and offered this justified criticism:

The passage of this bill would work irreparable injury to agriculture. Its purpose is to repeal the long- and short-haul clause of the fourth section of the Transportation Act, paving the way for a cutthroat rate war against boat and truck lines and other competitors of the rail carriers. To finance such a rate war the railroads would keep their freight rates to the intermediate non-competitive points on a high level.

The farmer lives in the interior. The farmer is the intermediate shipper. The farmer is the man who is located at the noncompetitive point, and the farmer is the man who would have to pay the bill, in the form of exorbitant freight rates, to finance the railroads in a rate war with other carriers.

This kind of legislation would drive industry to the seacoast and depopulate the interior of the country. It would remove the farmer's market farther and farther from him and increase his cost of doing business.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK].

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I am glad for the opportunity afforded me in these few minutes to speak briefly in support of this bill, the author of which is my esteemed and able colleague from Indiana [Mr. PETTINGILL].

For sometime it has been apparent to me from the source of the opposition to this bill that some of the competing transportation agencies have some advantage, by reason of governmental regulation or restriction of railroads that they want to hold onto. I have no quarrel with those people who are seeking to hold onto an advantage, if they have one; but, after all, that does not reflect an advantage to the shippers of the country or to the people of the country generally.

I have an idea that many of the governmental restraints and regulations, as they affect railroads, were enacted and adopted at a time when the railroads had a virtual monopoly in the transportation field. What has developed since that time? We have seen the expansion and development of waterways, of bus and truck transportation, until today the railroads do not have a monopoly in transportation, but, on the other hand, they are subjected to fierce competition, which is probably as it should be. But as the gentleman from Ohio has suggested, what is wrong with giving the railroads a fair deal and an equal opportunity in the competitive field?

If we will reflect upon the industrial and economic development of this country we will see that all manner of things in industry and transportation have become obsolete and have been forced out of the picture because they were obsolete. Some people today would have you believe the railroads are obsolete; that as a system of transportation they are antiquated and that we do not need them any more. If that is really true, then I say that as a part of the history of the industrial development of this country they will go out of the picture. But before they are determined to be obsolete, before we say that the railroads are to be supplanted by any other system of transportation, let us put them on a fair and equal basis, to the end that they shall have an equal chance, and no more, for their continuing existence. [Applause.]

I cannot see where this bill is going to create any undue advantage for the railroads. Rather, it will do no more than give the railroads an equal opportunity along with all of the other competing systems of transportation. If they are able to survive, then I say let them survive.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. REECE. After this bill has been passed will not the Interstate Commerce Commission have every power over the railroads which they now have with respect to fixing rates and otherwise protecting the people from any unjust discrimination?

Mr. HALLECK. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Then why the legislation, if that statement is true?

Mr. HALLECK. I am attempting to give my reasons for supporting this bill.

Mr. REECE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, there will be a change, a difference, only in procedure and not with respect to the power which the Interstate Commerce Commission will still have over these matters. Their power will not be lessened in any degree with respect to discrimination and other control over the operation of the railroads.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. No; I cannot yield further.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. There is, of course, something in this legislation. I would not stand on the floor and say that it is going to have no effect. I say that its fundamental effect will be to give the railroads as a competing system of transportation a fair opportunity in open competition to make a fight for their lives, which they have a right to make. [Applause.] You might as well line up three foot racers, two of them unfettered, and then put a ball and chain on the third, whom we will call the railroads, and say: "Now, you railroad runner, go out in this race and win if you can." I do not believe that is the manner in which governmental restraint, governmental regulation, is intended to operate. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to myself.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Georgia raised the point that this would destroy water transportation. With the natural advantages water transportation has to serve the cities on the coasts and many inland rivers, with the subsidies and appropriations that have been made for rivers and harbors, that this bill will destroy water transportation while these lines of water transportation enjoy this subsidy. The railroads have been paying taxes to every State, to every county, and to every municipality; in most instances being the highest taxpayer; and I join my colleague from Ohio in insisting that these amendments will bring fair treatment to the railroads of the Nation as against bus and truck lines and as against water transportation; because as to rates, buses, trucks, and water transportation are not under the strict regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and until that hour arrives, and I believe it will arrive, the railroads should have the same opportunity to fix rates on the long haul that will be fair on a competitive basis, which right is now enjoyed by these competing lines of transportation.

Published rates of the railroads are now public and the procedure is that if they are raised or if the Commission desires to alter them of their own initiative the rates are suspended. There is no new procedure with reference to placing a lower rate on the longer haul under this bill. They are made under the same procedure that now operates with reference to the publication of rates.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. Under the present law does not the carrier have to make application to the Commission and obtain consent of the Commission before they can change the rate?

Mr. GREENWOOD. As I understand, under the regulations, they must publish these rates and hearings must be held. That is what this bill proposes.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. The gentleman certainly does not mean that under the present law the railroads must make application for relief and hearings be held before relief is granted affirmatively.

Mr. COX. The Commission may grant relief pending hearing if it sees fit.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not understand that is the procedure. As I understand, procedure under this bill will not be different from what has been pursued in the past. Rates must be published and the Commission can suspend a rate, or any shipper can object to it and have a hearing.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I should like to finish my statement; I have only 2 or 3 minutes remaining.

So, Mr. Speaker, we ask for this fair treatment as between railroads and these competing carriers. I cannot see how any rate would be raised on a short haul. These competitive rates will be on transcontinental hauls or on the longer hauls where there is competition from water-borne commerce. That does not mean that any rate to intermediate points would be increased, and I do not understand that this bill gives any power to raise rates on the intermediate hauls.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; I do not think so. I consulted the author of the bill.

Mr. COX. I challenge the author of the bill.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I believe it will mean a lowering of all rates; that by taking into consideration in the rate structure a fair return, considering the overhead and the increased volume of business, that it will make an increased return, so that the Commission can carry out the policy that was recently carried out in reducing the passenger rates on its own initiative by giving a proper return to the railroads on the whole rate structure. On this basis I believe that even the intermediate rates will be lowered.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. It has not worked out that way so far, and will not.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That was the report by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the rule be adopted, in order that this question may be thoroughly discussed in the ensuing general debate on the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL) there were—ayes 155, noes 30.

So the resolution was agreed to.

THE RAILROADS HAVE BEEN THE GREATEST POSSIBLE BENEFICIARIES OF WATERWAY IMPROVEMENTS FOR NAVIGATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a bill is now pending with the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries seeking to consolidate all agencies of waterway transportation with the railroads, and placing them under the Interstate Commerce Commission. The claim is made by the proponents of the measure that the railroads have been subjected to burdensome and unnecessary regulations under the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, therefore, boats engaged in the movement of freight upon our inland waters, and also ships under American registry transporting our commerce upon the high seas should also be subjected to the same harsh methods of regulation.

It is not my purpose to discuss at this time the supposed merits or demerits of this proposed law. I do propose, however, to discuss some of the misleading propaganda that is now being urged as a reason for its enactment. For the past 10 years the country has been literally covered with propaganda to the effect that the railroads have been heavily taxed to build highways, and to improve waterways for the free use of their competitors which are virtually untaxed, while the railways themselves receive no benefits from such Government subsidies. A review of the facts will show how much truth there is in these contentions.

It is true that the railroads are taxed, and that a portion of the taxes paid by them is used for building and maintaining highways over which trucks and busses operate. It is also true that rivers and harbors have been improved and maintained from general taxation, and that they are used by boats in moving commerce, some of which may be in competition with the railroads.

I shall not at this time discuss the question of transportation over our highways as the trucks and busses have already been placed under the Interstate Commerce Commission. I will, however, give a brief comparison of the taxes paid by trucks and railroads, respectively.

The taxes paid by the railroads in 1933 amounted to $249,623,198. This included all taxes paid to the Federal Government as well as those paid to the respective States, counties, cities, and local taxing districts throughout the country.

During the same year—1933—the trucks paid a total tax of slightly more than $303,000,000. This included excise taxes paid to the Federal Government, and also ad valorem taxes paid to the States, counties, municipalities, and taxing districts. It also included gasoline and license taxes.

The railroads are valued at $26,000,000,000. The taxes paid by them is the equivalent of about 95 cents on the $100 valuation. It is impossible to ascertain the value of the trucks, but in any event, the taxes paid by them amounts to several dollars on the $100 valuation.

The taxes paid by the railroads consist principally of ad valorem taxes paid to the respective States and their subdivisions. Only a very small proportion of it goes into the Federal Treasury. River and harbor improvements are paid for out of the Federal Treasury, to which the railroad contribution is infinitesimal.

If Congress should stop all river and harbor improvements entirely and allow them to deteriorate into total ruin, it would not diminish the taxes paid by the railroads to the extent of one mill. They would continue to be taxed just as they are now, but in such event they would be deprived of the enormous amount of business they are now receiving on account of the improved waterways.

A letter from General Brown, as Chief of Engineers, on December 16, 1932, shows that the total expenditures for river and harbor improvements from the beginning of our Government to June 30, 1932, amounted to $1,355,877,301.32. The statement is as follows:

	New work	Maintenance
Atlantic coast harbors.....	$276, 208, 555.35	$83, 627, 913.57
Gulf coast harbors.....	85, 811, 659.54	51, 843, 300.30

Total.....	1, 062, 210, 977.15	293, 606, 324.17

This statement did not include expenditures for flood control on the Mississippi and Sacramento under the Flood Control Act, nor expenditures at Muscle Shoals for military purposes.

The statement shows a total expenditure of $1,355,877,301.37, of which $802,197,863.06 were upon seacoast and lake harbors and channels, including Hawaii, Alaska, and Puerto Rico, and only $553,679,438.26 upon rivers and intra-coastal channels. These expenditures were made during a period of about 125 years, and approximately 67 percent of the total was upon coastal harbors.

The improvement of our seacoast and lakes harbors has practically very little bearing upon inland transportation by water. Out of a total of more than 200 such harbors only a small number is connected with the interior through rivers on which freights are transported. All these harbors, however, have interior connections through rail lines. Some of our principal ports have interior connections through 15 to 20 lines of railroad.

Our harbors are the connecting links between the ships and the railroads and are equally beneficial and necessary to both. It is there that the trains meet the ships, and their loads are transferred back and forth from one to the other. If such improvements constitute a subsidy to the ships, they also constitute an equal subsidy to the railroads.

Several lines of ocean ships engaged in the coastwise trade are owned and operated by railroads. The Morgan Line, for instance, is a part of the Southern Pacific System. It operates between Gulf and Atlantic ports and, like other boat lines, has the full benefit of the free use of those ports maintained at Government expense.

The railroads also get the benefit of our improved harbors in the operation of their car-ferriage boats. These boats are operated by the railroads to some extent in nearly all the major ports of the United States. A large number of harbors on the Great Lakes have been improved by the Government almost exclusively for railroad use in transporting their loaded cars by boat. Congress has willingly provided the necessary waterway improvements for this purpose in order to facilitate the systematic movement of our commerce, whoever the carrier may be.

The car-ferriage traffic of the railroads over our improved waterways has become so enormous that a few illustrations may be of interest.

The great port of New York includes several hundred miles of docks, wharves, and navigable channels. Some of the different branches of the harbor are as follows: Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channel, Gowanus Creek, East River Channel, Newtown Creek, Buttermilk Channel, Wallabout Channel, Upper Bay Channel, Hudson River Channel, New York and New Jersey Channels, and Harlem River Channel.

On these 10 branches of New York Harbor improved by the Government, the car ferryboats operated by the railroads in 1930 carried freight valued at $14,560,005,900. This constituted more than 50 percent of the total commerce on those channels, the traffic handled by the ships being valued at $13,224,034,207. Baltimore, Norfolk, New Orleans, San Francisco, and various other ports have had large volumes of car-ferriage traffic. At Galveston, the Government maintains a channel to Bolivar Peninsula for the exclusive use of the railroads in ferrying loaded cars to and from the piers on Galveston Channel.

The harbors of New Orleans and Key West, improved by the Government, accommodate railroad car ferry ships operating to Habana, Cuba, the loaded cars being switched to the rail lines at either end of the water haul.

The railroad car ferriage traffic on the Great Lakes has assumed large proportions. At Manistique in 1934 it was valued at $16,808,300, while the freights handled by other boats amounted to only $166,700.

At Kewaunee the car-ferriage traffic was valued at $36,800,200, and all other boat traffic was valued at $22,150.

At Frankfort the car-ferriage traffic was $113,989,100, and other boat traffic only $64,700.

Through Sturgeon Bay Canal the car-ferriage traffic amounted to $16,911,200, and all other boat traffic was $907,200.

Similar conditions exist at Menominee, Manitowoc, Grand Haven, Muskegon, and other ports. At the great port of Milwaukee the railroad car ferriage traffic amounted to $139,501,800, while all the other boat traffic was $98,637,300. At Rochester the car-ferriage traffic exceeded that of all other boats to the extent of approximately $1,000,000.

The normal commerce on the Great Lakes, other than that handled by the railroad-car ferryboats, is about 100,000,000 to 120,000,000 tons. Those freights are handled by rail at both ends of the line. The bulk of this traffic consists of ore, coal, wheat, and fluxing stone, in the order named. It is all delivered to the boats by the railroads and delivered back to the railroads at the end of the water haul.

The railroads receive about 10 mills per ton-mile on these freights and the boats 1 mill per ton-mile. Without the cheap water haul for a great distance over the Lakes, none of this traffic would ever have been available to the railroads, with the possible exception of wheat, which may have moved by rail. These ports where all those bulk commodities are transferred back and forth between the water and rail hauls, have been far more beneficial to the railroads than to the boats.

The car-ferriage traffic on the Great Lakes was inaugurated in 1892 by the Ann Arbor Railroad Co. The first trip was between Frankfort, Mich., and Kewaunee, Wis. The service on Lake Michigan is now said to be the most extensive of its kind in the world. Trains arriving at a port on one side of Lake Michigan, the loaded cars are switched onto a huge ferryboat and conveyed across the Lake, a distance of 60 to 120 miles, where they are switched back to the rail lines and continue their journey. The Government dredged and maintains the channels through which these boats operate. The savings to these railroads on account of this service runs into many millions of dollars each year.

The Board of Engineers of the War Department and the Bureau of Operations of the United States Shipping Board report that in 1930 four ferries were operated between Grand Haven and Milwaukee by the Grand Trunk Railway; nine between Ludington and Milwaukee, Manitowoc, and Kewaunee by the Pere Marquette Railway; six between Frankfort, Menominee, and Manistique, Mich., and between Frankfort, Manitowoc, and Kewaunee by the Ann Arbor Railroad.

Railroad ferry lines are also operated between Ashtabula and Port Maitland, between Ashtabula and Port Burwell, and between Conneaut and Port Stanley and Rondeau Harbor.

Between Detroit and Windsor six car-ferry lines are operated by four railroads—one by the Grand Trunk, two by the Wabash, two by the Canadian Pacific, and one by the Pere Marquette. These ferries are also extended to passenger-train service, including their loads of baggage, express, and United States mails.

Car ferries also operate across the Straits of Mackinac, the St. Clair River, Lake Ontario, and the St. Lawrence River, several of them including passenger-car and mail service for the railroads.

These railroad ferryboats are of steel construction, with capacity for 20 to 30 loaded cars, and now carry from 15 to 20 automobiles on the bows without loss of space for loaded railroad cars. They are also equipped with comfortable modern passenger accommodations.

These car-ferry boats have the benefit of continuous service across the lake throughout the year, while all other boats engaged there are forced to abandon service for at least 4 months in the year on account of ice. In all, there are 35 railroad car-ferry lines in operation on the Great Lakes. The boats are the largest type afloat on these waters. They make about 18 miles an hour and the railroads receive all the passenger, freight, express, and mail transportation charges, and the Government dredges and maintains the harbors and channels free of cost to them, the same as it does for all other boats engaged in traffic.

These car-ferry lines are the connecting links for a large number of railroads which are beneficiaries of this service. The volume, Transportation Series No. 1, issued in 1930 by the Board of Engineers of the War Department and the Bureau of Operations of the Shipping Board, on page 407 has the following to say upon this point:

[Transportation on the Great Lakes. Transportation Series No. 1 (revised 1930). Prepared by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, War Department, and the Bureau of Operations, United States Shipping Board (p. 407)]

CONNECTING RAILROADS

A map has been prepared especially for this report showing the car-ferry routes on the Great Lakes and the rail lines of which the ferries are connecting links.

At Manistique the car ferries operated by the Ann Arbor Railroad connect with the Manistique & Lake Superior Railway, which in turn has connection with the Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway (Soo Line). Practically all of the car-ferry commerce at this port is received from and delivered to the latter railroad. At Menominee the Ann Arbor ferries make connection with the Chicago & North Western Railway, the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific, and Wisconsin & Michigan Railroads. At Kewaunee the Ann Arbor and Pere Marquette ferries have connection with the Kewaunee, Green Bay & Western Railroad, which in turn connects with the Chicago & North Western; Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific; and the Green Bay & Western at Green Bay. Manitowoc is the eastern terminus of a branch of the Soo Line, and has direct connection with the Chicago & North Western. Indirect connection at this port is had with the Ann Arbor and the Pere Marquette Railroads via car ferries from Frankfort and Ludington, respectively.

At Milwaukee the Pere Marquette car ferries from Ludington and those of the Grand Trunk from Grand Haven, have connection with the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pacific, Chicago & North Western, and Soo Line. The Michigan Central and Pennsylvania Railroads serve Mackinaw City and the car ferries of the Mackinac Transportation Co. make connection with the Duluth, South Shore & Atlantic Railway at St. Ignace.

The Pere Marquette and the Canadian National Railways reach Sarnia, Ontario, and the car ferry operated by the former railroad connects with this carrier at Port Huron. Windsor, Ontario, is reached by the Pere Marquette, Wabash, and Grand Trunk Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railroad. The car ferries owned by the first three-named carriers connect with these railroads at Detroit. The Canadian Pacific ferries make connection with the Wabash at Detroit.

Two of the car ferries operating across Lake Erie, indirectly connect the Pennsylvania and New York Central Railroads at Ashtabula, with the Canadian Pacific at Port Burwell, and the Toronto, Hamilton & Buffalo Railway at Port Maitland, Ontario. Conneaut is reached by the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad and the car ferries of the Marquette, and Bessemer Dock & Navigation Co., operating from this port, make connection with the Pere Marquette at Rondeau, and the London & Port Stanley Railway at Port Stanley, Ontario.

The car ferries operating across Lake Ontario connect with the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh Railway at Charlotte (Rochester) on the American side and with the Canadian National Railways at Cobourg on the Canadian side. Ogdensburg is served by the New York Central, which connects with the Canadian Pacific at Prescott, Ontario, via car ferry.

A study of the question will convince anyone that our expenditures for waterway improvements for navigation have been of tremendous benefit to the railroads. Any statements by their officials to the contrary are merely for the purpose of gaining public sympathy in an effort to secure further subsidies. Even inland navigation has been greatly beneficial to the railroads as the unimpeachable record will show.

The greatest volume of inland water transportation has been in the Pittsburgh district, on the Allegheny, Monongahela, and upper Ohio Rivers. That is also the zone of the greatest density of rail traffic. The water-borne commerce of that district increased from 9,000,000 tons in 1900, to 40,000,000 tons in 1925. During the same period, the rail traffic increased from 57,000,000 tons to 173,000,000 tons. The cheap water transportation of raw bulk materials, built up great industries which produced many millions of tons of steel and other products which moved by rail, and at great profit to the railroads.

LONG- AND SHORT-HAUL RATES

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3263) to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4).

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3263, with Mr. WILCOX in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill of great public importance. It is an unusual bill in the sense that it is only a page and a half long, and yet a good deal of study and patience is necessary to understand its application to the complex structure of American agriculture, industry, and transportation.

There is probably no man living who could answer off-hand all the questions which might be asked as to the detail application of the bill. For 49 years a Chinese maze of court decisions, rules, regulations, tariffs, and rate structures have grown up around the subject. And so, instead of becoming lost in a maze of detail, I shall attempt to sketch the subject in broad outline against the background of the common welfare of the Nation as a whole. Outside of passenger traffic, now two-thirds gone, railroads exist only to move goods from producer to consumer. The interests of shipper, buyer, and carrier are interwoven. The welfare of each is, in the long run, the welfare of all.

So, at the beginning, let us remember that this is essentially a shippers' bill and not a railroad bill. It originated as a shippers' bill, having been written and first sponsored by the National Industrial Traffic League, representing some 600,000 shippers throughout the Nation. As shippers, why did they sponsor it? Only to reduce distribution costs, broaden markets, and quicken service. Shippers are not interested in railroads, as such. Their prime interest is to reduce costs to the buyer and thus enlarge the markets of the producers of the Nation.

Let us get this point straight. Practically every petition for relief against the long- and short-haul clause as now written, filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, is filed only because some shipper asks the railroads how he can move goods into a market foreclosed to him by transportation costs.

Let me give two or three illustrations. Some years ago the newsprint industry of northern Michigan and surrounding territory wanted to get newsprint to the newspapers of the South to meet the competition of newsprint entering those markets by water, from Nova Scotia and Scandinavia. Unless they could meet the delivered price of their foreign competitors they would lose that market. They asked the railroads to obtain fourth-section relief. The railroads applied. The Commission denied the application and American workmen and capital stood idle.

Another illustration. I am told that Australian and Argentine wheat is now coming into the Southeast and American wheat from our Northwest is precluded from that market because the fourth section prevents the railroads from quoting Northwestern farmers freight rates that will permit them to move wheat to Florida and the Southeast in competition with wheat from abroad.

One more illustration from hundreds that might be given. The beet-sugar industry of Colorado and the West favors this bill. Why? Because they want to enter the great consuming markets of the East in competition with sugar that moves by water from Cuba and the Philippines.

This ought to make plain why occasions arise when railroads ought to be permitted to charge less for the long than for the short haul. Those occasions arise only when competitive conditions exist at the point of destination which make it necessary, in the interests of shippers and buyers, to do so. Otherwise, speaking broadly, freight rates ought to be in rough proportion to length of movement. But in quoting less for the long than for the short haul, when that is necessary, railroads do only what practically every producer does. Few people do all their business on the same margin of profit. They sell first where they can sell to the best advantage and then they sell their surplus for whatever they can get for it, provided it yields some profit, however small.

Railroads sell surplus transportation in the same way that producers sell surplus goods. The principle is exactly the same whether newsprint, wheat, or beet sugar. A truck farmer close to a county seat will haul tomatoes into that market two trips a day. His surplus tomatoes he will haul into the next county seat, one trip a day. His margin of profit is different at the two points. He gets less for the long than for the short haul. But he is glad to get into the distant market, even at a small profit. It helps carry his overhead of labor, taxes, interest, and so forth. But he could not exist if he had to sell all his goods at the margin prevailing at the distant point. No more can the railroads.

If the farmer had no wagon of his own to carry his tomatoes, he would ask some truckman to shave his price for carrying the produce to a distant market. If the truckman did not help him share the differential between the two markets he might not be able to enter the market at all, and his surplus tomatoes would rot on the ground, as surplus freight cars now rust on the tracks.

A like principle is involved in the American farmer getting what he can in the domestic market and then shipping his surplus to foreign markets for a less margin of profit. Again he gets less for the long than for the short haul, but if the price for all farm products was that which obtains in the foreign market he could not carry on at all.

Even goods nationally sold at a uniform price, for example, the Saturday Evening Post, do not and cannot yield the same profit delivered at Seattle as in Philadelphia.

The bill therefore is designed to do what shippers, notably agriculture, have clamored for for years, that is, reduce distribution costs, broaden markets, foster competition, and increase the standards of living of all our people through reducing the cost of living and increasing the total volume of goods consumed by reducing unit costs. The bill in its long-run effect cannot but tend to reduce freight rates generally and thus benefit 125,000,000 people by bringing the power to consume into better balance with our power to produce, which is our prime problem today. [Applause.]

If you are looking at the interests of the Nation as a whole, rather than the competitive position of some manufacturer or jobber of whetstones who wants his competitor eliminated from some market by prohibitive transportation costs, vote for the bill. The railroads and their workers can gain only if the Nation gains; that is, more goods moved from factory and farm to more consumers at less cost, in less time, and with less wear, tear, and damage, and moved by a carrier that pays more taxes and the highest wages of any transportation agency.

The fourth section was first written in 1887, in the first bill placing railroad rates and practices under Federal supervision. At that time the railroads enjoyed a practical monopoly of the transportation services of the Nation, and, as always happens when monopoly is unregulated, serious abuses prevailed with respect to secret rebates and discriminations between shippers and localities; I do not defend those abuses then and would not tolerate them now. But to carry over into conditions today the justified resentment and prejudice against railroad management that arose at that time is as foolish as keeping alive the passions that arose in the always to be regretted War between the States. We ought not to penalize shippers and railway employees of today with the inherited prejudices of a generation ago. Except for this inheritance, plus the rigidity of thinking that has prevented an open-minded approach, I am confident we would have long ago given the shippers and the rail carriers the flexibility necessary to keep pace with the increasing tempo of twentieth century civilization. [Applause.]

In 1910 the fourth section was tightened up, and in 1920 the screws were turned once more. For the moment let me pass over those technical changes and consider the situation as we find it today.

In 1887 the railroads had a monopoly, and abused it. Today there is no monopoly.

Since the fourth section was written the Panama Canal has been dug. Since then pipe lines have entered the transportation field. Since then electricity has learned to move "coal by wire", and Government-financed hydro projects are eating into the soft-coal industry, whose product once moved by rail. Since then hundreds of millions of tax money have been spent on river and harbor development. Since then the Federal Government has itself become a common carrier competing with the railroads, with its barge lines on the lower Mississippi, which are now to be extended on the upper Mississippi and Missouri Rivers. Since then Federal tax money has laid its ribbons of concrete in nearly every county of the Republic, upon which some 25,000,000 motor vehicles now move daily in the carriage of passengers and freight. Since then aviation has invaded the transportation field, aided by Federal subsidies. Since 1887, when the fourth section was first written, it is computed that the Federal Government alone, exclusive of States, has poured $4,841,000,000 into these competing agencies and their rights-of-way for which, except for the Panama Canal, they pay nothing. A substantial fraction of that enormous sum has come from railroad taxation. For the Nation as a whole, 14 percent of railroad taxes go to build highways for their competitors to use. Other railroad tax money goes to subsidize rivers and harbors, merchant marine, and aviation. Meantime no aid has been given to the railroads, other than R. F. C. loans, to be repaid with 4-percent interest, to bail them out of the bankruptcy courts into which the Government has itself been pushing them.

It is true that in the early days railroads, particularly the transcontinental lines, were also subsidized by the grant of lands from the public domain, lands which were worthless both to the Government and the railroads until the railroads themselves made them valuable. But with respect to these old Federal subsidies in aid of railroad development, it is to be pointed out that in consideration of them the railroads entered into perpetual contract with the United States Government to carry troops and munitions of war at half price. But with reference to these other subsidies, the recipients are under no obligation to the Nation. With them it has been more blessed to receive than to give.

We now have five large agencies of transportation, whereas in 1887 the railroads had a practical monopoly. These five are the railways themselves, pipe lines, waterways, highways, and airways. Of the five, the railroads alone are hamstrung with the long- and short-haul section. While they struggle to obtain relief from it, their competitors take their customers from them. They are like fighters in the prize ring, with one fighter's hands tied behind his back while his antagonist is free to cut him to ribbons. Looking, therefore, at the whole national picture rather than the interest of any transportation agency, I submit that the railroads are entitled to have these legislative handcuffs removed in the interest of moving goods from producer to consumer.

Neither the truck-and-bus bill of last summer nor the water-carrier bill now pending puts these competing agencies under the long- and short-haul restriction. It is literally true that a shipload of lumber can be legally moved from Seattle to Boston for less than from Seattle to Portland, if necessary to prevent the railroads from getting the traffic.

Mr. Eastman has suggested that the way to do equity among rails, ships, and trucks is to place them all under the long and short haul. The ships and trucks would object to this violently. Moreover, for trucks and ships the idea is wholly impracticable, for the reason that they are not tied to fixed routes and so could circumvent the law if applied to them.

To carry over the fourth section into the highly competitive transportation conditions of today is a legislative anachronism.

No one, of course, can attribute the plight of the railroads to the fourth section alone. Nor would I give the railroads a single legislative privilege over competing agencies. I would, however, remove the legislative advantage which competing agencies now have over railways, because they are free from the fourth section and the railroads are bound and hampered with it.

As Commissioner Eastman has said, "No public regulation should be provided merely for the purpose of protecting one form of transportation against another."

Despite the remarkable recovery which the Nation as a whole has had since the low point of 3 years ago, the Nation's largest industry is the Nation's sickest industry. You are bound to consider its welfare with the welfare of other interests. The cold hard fact is that more railway mileage went into bankruptcy and receivership in 1935 than in any year in the history of the Republic, not excepting the panic of the early nineties. Their ability to move goods, to buy goods, to employ men, to pay taxes, and to maintain service is a matter of grave concern. The contagion of railway sickness is a slow paralysis that creeps over the entire Nation.

In normal times the railroads buy everything from pins to locomotives. When they are not in the market for goods business and employment stagnate. Twenty-six railroads alone out of 800 buy from 7,816 companies in 1,661 towns in all the States.

The roads normally buy one-fifth of all the coal, iron, steel, and forest products of the Nation. To further itemize their contribution to national welfare the roads are normal buyers of $2,000,000 worth of linen and cotton sheets. Another $1,000,000 goes for crockery, another $2,000,000 for gasoline, and so on for thousands of items. From 1923 to 1934, good years and bad, railways spent for material and supplies $13,274,211,000, and in the same period for permanent betterments and additions to plant $7,587,481,000, a total of $20,861,692,000. All this is exclusive of pay rolls, taxes, and returns to capital, easily twenty-five or thirty billion more.

These expenditures contrast with the relief appropriations with which we are trying to conquer the depression.

The importance of the railways as taxpayers is not to be overlooked. They normally pay for the support of Government $1,000,000 a day. Forty-six percent of this went to support public schools, 14 percent went to build highways for their competitors to use. Out of every gross dollar of revenue water carriers pay to support Government nine-tenths of 1 percent. Railroads pay 8 cents, or nine times as much.

The repeal of the long and short haul simply places the railroads on terms of competitive equality with other carriers—no more, no less. Other sections of the interstate commerce clause remain in full force and effect to prevent discrimination against shippers, localities, or competing carriers. The burden of proof to justify proposed rates remains on the railroads. But the repeal will give the railroads a chance to fight for their economic lives on an equal field. After that, let the best man win.

It is time to give the roads a chance to put back to work thousands of the best workmen in America, both in transportation and in the durable-goods industries and the coal mines where the bulk of today's unemployment exists.

We have, as President Roosevelt once said, "a human as well as an economic problem." Railroad workers are home owners and community builders. Seven hundred thousand have been dismissed, many of them past the industrial dead line, forbidding their reabsorption in other employment. I speak for them and their families—your neighbors and friends. It is time to see that more of them are not pushed onto the industrial scrap heap because their chance to earn their daily bread has been taken away from them by competing transportation agencies, subsidized from the Public Treasuries, and free to run wild. [Applause.]

We have a duty to consider the welfare of railway workers equally with all other workers. Their record of service and citizenship entitled them to not be the "forgotten man" of recovery legislation.

Let me tell you something. Last year the 800 class 1 railroads of America did not lose the life of a single passenger in a passenger-train accident. That would be remarkable for any one of the 800 roads. For all 800 it is almost incredible, but it is true. It is one of the greatest epics of American business. Because of it a million men are entitled to honor—the man at the throttle, the brakeman, the conductor, the man in the signal tower, the unsung hero in jeans who in sleet and snow and fog and flood kept straight the track for the "iron horse." This was all done under the most adverse circumstances. All roads were in financial difficulty, many in actual bankruptcy, all economizing every cent of shrinking revenues.

At a time when it is popular to charge large-scale enterprise with piling up profits at the expense of human lives, I am glad to say in rebuttal that last year our railroads delivered every one of their passengers safely to their homes.

The total was 18,000,000,000 passenger miles without the loss of a passenger. Let me translate that for you. It is equivalent to carrying every human being on the globe 1 mile and then the inhabitants of eight other planets equally populated, if any. In terms of 1 passenger it would take him to the moon and back 47,000 times, or every day for 130 years.

It is time to stop kicking the railroads around.

While the railroads were making that marvelous record, trucks, busses, and private automobiles sent 36,000 Americans to their graves, many of them killed by drunken drivers who warm up their morning hates by cussing and damning the railroads.

In saying this I wish again to emphasize that we ask no favors for the roads. We ask only for fair play on an equal field. Water carriers and trucks and busses all have an important part to play. Each is fitted to perform some service best. I believe the rails, trucks, and ships will be coordinated as we progress. The trucks can best handle a great deal of short-haul traffic. They will take the place of railroad spurs and branch lines. In fact, 11,000 miles of rail trackage has already been abandoned—enough to cross the continent three times and more. The rails are now using the trucks for pick-up and delivery service. But for certain forms of transportation, especially long hauls of fast-moving freight, the railroads are indispensable to the prosperity of the entire Nation as well as its defense in time of war. Note page 8 of the report, what the rails would be required to do to protect the west coast if we ever have trouble on the Pacific. In time of emergency it is the rails that "carry on."

It may be asserted that if the bill passes, ancient abuses will reoccur. They cannot under competitive conditions. Again quoting Mr. Eastman, "The ability of the customer to use alternative modes of transportation" imposes a limitation upon railroad rates and practices that cannot be disregarded. Even if there were no law, competition today would free customers of transportation from the necessity to submit to abuses.

Nevertheless, the law against abuses remains in full force and effect. See pages 2, 3, and 4 of the report. I challenge any opponent of this bill to point to any possible abuse for which a legislative remedy is not fully available.

The bill simply gives the roads the right to file proposed rates for all shipments, the same as they now do for every shipment in which the long and short haul is not involved. All rates will be handled in exactly the same way. If there is no objection, the rates go into effect in 30 days instead of waiting months and years for I. C. C. approval—often denied. If there is objection, the bill puts on the rails the burden of proof to justify the proposed rate as fair, just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory within the other provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, all of which remain in full force and effect. Even if there is no objection, the Interstate Commerce Commission may suspend the proposed rate on its own motion and may fix maximum and minimum rates as they do in all other cases. The public interest remains fully protected. The Commission will continue to have full power to prevent the rails from doing anything that Congress ever intended they should not do. This is expressly admitted by Mr. Eastman.

Let us give the roads and those who use them a new deal and a square deal from the Government. [Applause.]

NOTE.—Authority: Freight-traffic report (1935) of Federal Coordinator Eastman.

(Mr. PETTENGILL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks by inserting the list and tables above referred to.)

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] has consumed 33 minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I desire.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it would be impossible for me to discuss this measure in the very able way that my colleague from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL] has discussed it. I wish I could. I am going to try to express my views on this legislation from the standpoint of a layman—not a lawyer.

I have been a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for a great many years, and, while I do not know everything about transportation and railroad legislation, yet I do try to inform myself on all these important subjects relating to this question.

Mr. Chairman, I believe we are prone to condemn the railroads for many shortcomings and for their failure to do for themselves those things which might increase their traffic, reduce expenses, and enable them to keep their rates low. We also expect them to get sufficient revenue, out of which they contribute heavily in taxes, to the States and Federal Government, to the extent of about 8 cents per dollar of revenue earned.

We also expect them to employ more than a million workers at good wages under reasonable service and working conditions. We regulate them to the last degree in everything they do. The Federal Coordinator of Transportation, Commissioner Eastman, within the past year has found that water carriers pay taxes representing less than 1 cent per dollar of revenue earned, as compared with 8 cents paid by the railroads per dollar of revenue earned, and that motor transportation contributed in taxes, on the average, of from 2 to 4 cents per dollar of revenue earned. But, out of these low taxes imposed upon motor and water carriers, we provide them with publicly constructed highways and waterways over which they operate.

I have been informed that it costs the railroads more than 30 cents per dollar earned to provide for the maintenance of their tracks and rights-of-way. When we compare this situation confronting the railroads with the benefits which the public gives to water and motor carriers for the few cents they pay in taxes per dollar of revenue earned, this is not an equitable treatment toward the railroads to start with.

It is my opinion that the long- and short-haul clause in the Interstate Commerce Act, to a great extent, prevents the railroads from entering the field of competition with water-carriers who are practically free of rate regulation, and furnished free harbors and many other benefits at the expense of the taxpayer, which the railroads do not receive. At the present time, by reason of the long- and short-haul clause, the railroads are powerless to protect themselves against their subsidized competitors, who are operating, in some degree, on funds out of the Public Treasury. In other words, the law as it now stands, prohibits the railways from fixing a rate that will give them an opportunity to compete with the motor- and water-carriers.

It is true at the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission is given authority to grant relief to the railroads in special cases and under certain conditions. However, the records show that the law is so administered that not only are there long delays, but also relief is not usually granted which will give to the railroads the right to establish competitive rates low enough to enable them to get a fair share of the traffic available. For example, on iron and steel from the Pittsburgh and Youngstown districts to the Pacific coast, the Commission has refused to permit the all-rate routes to put into effect rates that will equalize the rates—including all incidental charges—applicable, via the routes through the north Atlantic ports and thence via the routes of intercoastal water carriers. This is true of iron and steel from interior mills scattered between Pennsylvania and Colorado. I believe my colleague from Colorado will bear me out in this.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me, since he has mentioned Colorado, to interrupt?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I expect in my own time to show that the steel mills in my home city of Pueblo, Colo., cannot even get into Houston, Tex., on a direct rail line.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

In doing so, the Commission has eliminated many of the interior iron and steel mills.

In like manner, the Commission has refused to permit the railroads to establish rates on iron and steel from Pittsburgh, Pa.; Youngstown, Cleveland, Middletown, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; St. Louis and Kansas City, Mo.; and the steel mills of Colorado, to Texas gulf ports and adjacent points necessary to meet the competition of water-carried steel from other sources of supply, including foreign countries. In doing so, the Commission has eliminated many of the interior iron and steel mills from the business along the Gulf coast which they formerly enjoyed. These are but typical of hundreds of other industries who are in the same situation which was brought to the committee's attention.

And this accounts for the fact that hundreds of interior industries have dried up since the long- and short-haul clause was put into effect. Today representatives of thousands of industries and communities are demanding that the railroads shall again be given an opportunity of exercising their own initiative in establishing rates, subject, of course, to other sections of the Interstate Commerce Act, which require that all rates shall be reasonable, self-sustaining, and nondiscriminatory. The railway people are constantly on the ground with the shippers and are in a better position to determine what rates are necessary to move traffic. Under the long- and short-haul clause, we have gradually stripped the railways of much of the traffic they formerly handled. We have turned large tonnage over to subsidized forms of transportation which if now regulated at all are subject to no such stringent supervision as the railroads are. In practical effect, to some extent, we give to these subsidized forms of transportation a monopoly of the traffic that they choose to transport. Every railroad employee in the country is requesting the passage of the Pettengill bill, which is now before us for consideration. We are aware that there has been a great reduction in the ranks of railroad employees during the period of the last 5 years. Now I do not claim this heavy reduction in the employment of railroad labor is due to motor and waterway competition entirely. There is no question but what the depression of the last 5 years was a very strong factor in reducing railroad employment. It is my opinion, however, that a substantial part of the reduction in railroad labor at the present time is attributable to the competition of motor and water carriers.

I have a very warm feeling in my heart for railroad labor; and if I may be pardoned a personal reference at this time, for 17 years I sat in the cab of a locomotive and was elected from that locomotive cab to Congress. [Applause.] I know the work of a railroad employee. There are no better, higher-class, more intelligent or patriotic workmen in America today than the railroad employees. [Applause.]

I shall never forget how proud I was after firing a locomotive for 4 years when one Saturday afternoon the assistant foreman of engines came to the locomotive I was firing and said to me: "John, you are up for promotion, and we want you to take charge of a locomotive tomorrow. We will call you in a little later on and give you the examination." It was something I had waited for for 4 long years. I wanted to get over onto the right side of the cab. I see my colleague JOHN MARTIN smiling, because he was a locomotive engineer at one time. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I just want to say to him that he would wait 14 years now and then some before promotion came.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I remember how I hurried home. There were not many automobiles running in those days, and I had to walk about 3 miles. I went into the house and broke the news to my good little wife. It is not necessary for me to tell you she was pleased and proud. Then I went down town that evening and bought myself a new suit of Sweet-Orr overalls, and a new cap, and a pair of gloves with gauntlets that came way up to my elbows. I got to work an hour before starting time the next morning and put enough oil on that old pot to take it from here to San Francisco and back. [Applause.] Then I went to the telegraph office to get my orders. The operator gave me my orders, and I took them to the engine cab. It was a rule of the company that the fireman had to read the orders out loud to the engineer, so I handed him the orders, and I made him read them to me. That was one of the proudest moments of my life. I have those orders at home. I can tell you what they were. The 31 order was: "277 and 279 will wait at Struthers until 9:10 a. m. for extra 338 east." So you see I have a warm feeling of love in my heart for the railroad workers.

The railway workers are fully aware of the seriousness of competition facing the railroads by other means of transportation, namely, bus, truck, and waterways. They likewise realize that this competition is here to stay, that it is permanent. They have no desire to impose any unfair regulation or the destruction of this competition. I believe in water transportation, it has its place in our economic life. All they request is justice and fair play from Congress and an opportunity to meet their competitors on fair and equal footing and thereby be assured of their positions, which will enable them to make an honest living for themselves and those dependent upon them.

It is time that Congress gave to the railroads, their employees, the shippers, and the communities dependent upon them, a square deal and an equal opportunity to share in the movement of commerce in all parts of our country, and this we can do by providing more equitable and fairer regulation. The enactment of the Pettengill bill, which is now before us, is a step in this direction. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to vie in eloquence with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL], who would have swept us off our feet by his stirring appeal in behalf of the railroads. I have no quarrel with the railroads. I have no complaint of the workmen on the railroads. I shall not try to take you on a transportation trip to the moon or parts away from this mundane sphere. I want to discuss with you for a little while this bill and the effect of this bill upon the shippers of the country.

I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that the first consideration for the Members of the House is the best interest of the people of the Nation. Regardless of railroads, regardless of railroad employees, regardless of water carriers, and regardless of seamen on the ships, the first and primary consideration here is the best interest of the shippers of this country.

With this point in view, I want you to consider the bill that you are asked to vote on today. It states:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to charge or receive any greater compensation as a through rate than the aggregate of the intermediate rates subject to the provisions of this act.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the only limitation imposed by this act is that the through rate shall not exceed the aggregate of the intermediate rates. You may take two terminal points, say A and Z. You can run point B up as high as you please. You can run point D up as high as you please. You can come on down through the line and run them up as high as you please, and the only limitation is when you come to the through rate you shall not exceed the aggregate of all these intermediate rates. There is absolutely no limitation on the minimum that may be charged as a through rate to be recompensed by higher rates on intermediate points. As was stated in connection with the rule, there is another important consideration that you must bear in mind, and that is the burden that is going to rest upon the shippers of this country to defend against higher rates. It is said that the burden still rests upon the carriers to justify the rate in the event of an attack. In other words, if on the intermediate line the rate is increased, the carriers must justify it. But that is only if a shipper, or community, or the Commission itself attacks the rate. The carriers are under no duty to justify the rate as an initial proposition.

What does that mean? It means that the small town that you represent in the interior has to be represented by highly paid attorneys or skilled experts whose duty will be to watch the railroad rates as they are being filed and determine whether or not they are imposing an undue or an unreasonable burden upon that particular town. In other words, each community must be on guard. The Interstate Commerce need not do that work. It has many other things to do. That Commission is handling thousands of rates. Applications are coming in all the time from every source and of every conceivable character. Before you know it the rates are going to be increased to points in the interior. How are you going to escape that?

The gentleman from Indiana, notwithstanding his eloquence, admitted that a short time ago—I think in 1935—there was more railroad mileage in bankruptcy than at any other time in the history of the country. Are they going to make this up out of the water-borne commerce if they get all of this water-borne commerce? If they do get the $40,000,000 which is paid for water-borne commerce carried through the Panama Canal, what will that mean? It is not more than a drop in the bucket when we consider the railroads' gross revenue of $3,000,000,000. How are the railroads going to escape getting in the red and keeping in the red except by raising the rates to intermediate points? Especially is this true if they are going to bring the rates down at the more distant points to meet water-borne competition. That is all there is to this matter. The carriers wish to escape the necessity of justifying these rates when they put them in.

Mr. Chairman, what treatment have they received from the Interstate Commerce Commission? According to the arguments which have been made here today, the bill that is introduced should not be a bill to abolish the long and short haul. It should be a bill to reorganize the Interstate Commerce Commission and remove this agency that they say is imposing upon them these unreasonable burdens. I can state you case after case in which the contrary is true. Take the rates on citrus fruit from Florida. The Interstate Commerce Commission reduced the rates for the railroads to meet the competition of water carriers, even going to the extent of reducing the rates on the day when the vessels of water carriers are at the docks and then increasing the rates on other days. They say themselves that the Commission has ample power now to meet the long- and short-haul provision. Mr. Eastman said, when he appeared before the committee, that relief had been granted in 120 out of 150 cases that had been before the Commission.

Take the case of the rates in the Mississippi Valley. From New Orleans to Chicago the distance is 900 miles; there is water transportation as well as rail transportation. The Interstate Commerce Commission has permitted the rail lines to make a rate on sugar of 34 cents per 100 pounds, or 7.5 mills per ton-mile, from New Orleans to Chicago, while from New Orleans to Kansas City, a distance of 866 miles, the Commission has allowed the rail lines to charge a rate on sugar of 65 cents per 100 pounds, or 15 mills per ton-mile. From New Orleans to Dubuque, Iowa, a distance of 1,000 miles, where there is water transportation, the Commission has permitted the railroads to publish a rate on sugar of 38 cents per 100 pounds, while from New Orleans to Des Moines, Iowa, a distance of 1,016 miles, where no water transportation exists, the Commission has allowed the railroads to charge a rate on sugar of 65 cents per 100 pounds, or 12.8 mills per ton-mile, which is 67 percent higher than the rate to Dubuque. In other words, the railroads are being permitted to meet this water competition. Coordinator Eastman stated that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in 120 cases out of 150 cases brought before it, had granted relief to the railroads because of water competition.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the unemployment of railroad employees and what the trouble is there. The trouble is not with the water-carrier transportation. Railroad employees attach the decline in railroad tonnage and revenues since 1929 to the long and short haul. They disregard the economic depression and inroads made by the motor trucks. They did not complain in 1929 of the long and short haul in the act. Let us look at the figures, as shown on page 700 of the record.

The railroad employees in 1910 numbered 1,699,420. This number increased to 1,785,803 in 1917, or an increase of about 100,000, while they fell back in 1929, the year of our greatest prosperity, to 1,694,042, or 5,000 less than in 1910. The ton-miles of revenue freight carried—in millions—were 255,017 in 1910, 398,263 in 1917, and 450,189 in 1929. The number of ton-miles per employee, measured in ton-miles per employee, increased from 150,000 in 1910 to 223,005 in 1917, and to 265,748 miles in 1929. In other words, while the ton-miles of freight revenue carried almost doubled from 1910 to 1929, the personnel decreased by 5,000. It is obvious that the decline in jobs, the loss of positions, the placing of employees out of work, has not been due to the long and short haul, but to efficiencies in operation and to economies on the part of the railroads.

The number of ton-miles per employee increased from 150,000 in 1910 to 223,005 in 1917, and to 265,000, or an increase of 115,000 miles. Is this due to the long and short haul?

Mr. Chairman, the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it is not sufficiently protecting the railroads, can change its organization, but, as I have said, in 120 cases out of 150 they have granted relief. They have granted it in the steel case; they have granted it in the citrus case; they have granted it along the inland waterways. This measure means not alone the destruction of the carriers on the Panama Canal but it means the destruction also of water-borne commerce on the coast and the inland waterways. Are you willing to trust the railroads, when competition is destroyed, not to increase their rates and return to many of the conditions which existed in 1887? Upon their own confession the railroads are now facing bankruptcy. How is it possible for them now to reduce their rates to the more distant point without increasing their rates to the intermediate points in order to take care of additional losses?

This, gentlemen, is the crucial question before you. Are you willing to saddle upon your respective communities in the interior the burden of watching these schedules as they are submitted by the railroad carriers to see what additional burden is going to be placed upon that community? Are you willing to place upon your district the burden of employing highly paid lawyers or experts to defend you from these burdens? The average lawyer and the average man on this floor will find it about as difficult to read and interpret rate schedules as it would be for him, if he had never studied Greek, to undertake to read the work of Xenophon with only a Greek lexicon before him. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the passage of this legislation, particularly from the viewpoint of the railroad employee. The loss of business by the railroads to competitive forms of transportation has been so great that the passage of this legislation is a matter of great concern to all railroad employees.

Railroad employment is only one-half of what it was in 1920. Since 1929 there has been a decrease of 600,000 employees. In 1929 there were more than 1,600,000 railroad employees. Today less than 1,000,000 men and women are employed in railroad service. Men who have worked more than 20 years now find themselves out of service because of a lack in volume of business. These men were trained for railroad work and are at a terrible disadvantage in any other field. They are home owners and citizens of good standing. Their monthly pay is highly important in supporting local merchants and the general community. Surely, they are entitled to fair consideration in maintaining their employment and should be protected by their Government.

against unfair trade practices, particularly from the types of competition made potent because their employees on the average receive less compensation for their services and whose labor relations are not regulated.

The class 1 railroads of the United States have modernized their equipment, both plant and rolling, to such a degree that it would be conservative to say that they could handle 40 percent more business than they do at the present time without any material increase in their overhead outside of the increase in pay rolls. Without volume of business, the railroads will never be able to pay a reasonable return upon the valuation of the properties and, certainly, without increased volume of business, there is no way in which railroad unemployment can be relieved.

There is approximately $26,000,000,000 invested in our railroads. Normally, their gross operating income is more than $6,000,000,000 annually. But, because of general industrial conditions now existing and unfair competition permitted by Federal statute, that gross revenue has dropped 50 percent, to $3,271,000,000, for 1934. We find, also, that only about one-half of the plant equipment is being used. We are all hoping and striving for a general reduction in the rail-rate structure. This necessary objective can only be accomplished by restoring to some semblance of normalcy the volume of freight the railroads handle.

The opening of the Panama Canal aggravated the difficulties of our transcontinental railroad carriers. Railroad employees recognize the necessity and the desirability of the Panama Canal, but we do protest against existing laws which make it impossible for transcontinental railroad carriers to compete with intercoastal water carriers, who were made potent as competitors only because they use the Panama Canal. Particularly do we protest when these competitors are in no way under the control of the Federal Government. They go unregulated, they do not have to publish their rates, are free to change them at will without previous notice, may pay rebates, give allowances, provide storage, perform special services, allow special privileges, and otherwise secretly and openly favor individual shippers. The record of the Interstate Commerce Commission clearly indicates that these special privileges representing compensations of several cents per hundred pounds are indulged in to a very considerable extent by the water carriers.

The testimony before the subcommittee clearly discloses that the intercoastal water carriers frankly admit that they have a monopoly upon the traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. That is made possible by the existence of the so-called long- and short-haul clause in the Interstate Commerce Act, because that statute prohibits the railroads from charging a lower rate for transporting commodities over a long distance than over a shorter distance. The passage of this legislation would still permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercise control of rates charged by the railroads, the railroads merely having the right of putting into force rate structures without prolonged and exhaustive hearings being held by the Interstate Commerce Commission prior to their going into effect. However, the Interstate Commerce Commission would still be empowered to suspend the rates if they deemed them unfair and unreasonable and not in the public interest.

Bus and truck transportation, water transportation, air transportation, and pipe-line transportation are not subjected to restrictions such as are carried in section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act. Why, then, insist upon shackling an industry which has done more than its share to develop this country? An industry which built, maintains, and owns its operating roadbed and signal equipment, in direct contrast to the busses and trucks now, figuratively at least, in possession of highways, which were built and are maintained by the taxpayers; and also in contrast with water and air transportation, a large portion of whose operating cost is actually borne by the Federal Government. Why circumscribe the railroad industry with regulations preventing it from meeting competitors on a real competitive basis? Certainly you have given their competitors enough trade advantages already.

The intercoastal carriers enjoy more than a monopoly of the Atlantic-Pacific coast business. They go far into the interior, with the resultant demoralization of all other transportation. This is possible because section 4 applies to the railroad carriers but does in no way restrict any other form of transportation.

The effect on railroad-freight volume, due to the viciousness of the operation of the long- and short-haul clause is probably best illustrated by the undisputed testimony before the subcommittee of Mr. J. P. Haynes, executive vice president of the Chicago Chamber of Commerce. I quote:

"The Panama Canal record shows that the total tonnage carried by steamship lines between the eastern and western coasts of the United States (excluding east-bound oil in tank ships) increased from 1,961,874 tons of 2,000 pounds each in 1921 to 8,230,697 tons in 1929, which tonnage for the most part was traffic which the railroads had theretofore transported, and which they would now be transporting but for the Panama Canal. This tonnage includes all sorts of traffic, including heavy articles, such as iron and steel products, as well as manufactured articles of every variety, a substantial volume of which moved from points as far inland as St. Paul, Minn., and Moline, Ill., through the Atlantic seaboard and thence by boat. For example, the rate on hoisting machinery, carloads from St. Paul, Minn., to Los Angeles or San Francisco, Calif., all rail, is $1.83 per hundred pounds, load minimum weight 30,000 pounds, while the rate from St. Paul to Baltimore by rail is 75 cents per hundred pounds, carload minimum weight, 30,000 pounds, and the boat rate from Baltimore to Los Angeles or San Francisco, through the Panama Canal, is 75 cents, making a combination rate via this rail and water route of $1.50 per hundred pounds, as compared with the $1.83 per hundred pounds rate via rail direct from St. Paul to these points. This is $99 per car lower via Atlantic seaboard than via all rail direct. The all-rail rate on agricultural implements from Moline, Ill., to Pacific coast cities is $1.86 per hundred pounds, minimum weight 24,000 pounds.

These agricultural implements can be carried by rail from Moline to the Atlantic seaboard for 54 cents per hundred pounds, and thence by boat through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast for 55 cents per 100 pounds, making a total rate of $1.09 per hundred pounds, a difference of 77 cents in favor of the rail-and-water route through the Panama Canal, or $184.80 per car."

Certainly this undisputed testimony proves conclusively that the intercoastal water carriers have more than a monopoly of the Atlantic-Pacific business. It is cheaper to ship from St. Paul, Minn., by rail to Baltimore, then by boat to the Atlantic Ocean, down the coast, through the Panama Canal, and up the Pacific coast to Los Angeles or San Francisco than by rail direct, all because, by Federal statute, we have hamstrung the railroad carriers by persisting in not modifying section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act. [Applause.]

For every ton of freight recovered by the railroads, they would give 2 hours of employment to 1 hour that remained in the transportation service by water.

In addition, the railroads pay approximately 7 percent of their revenue in taxes. The intercoastal water carriers pay less than 1 percent of their revenue in taxes, or about $9 out of every thousand dollars taken in, while the railroads pay between seventy and eighty dollars per thousand dollars in taxes, or an amount almost nine times greater than the water carriers pay. Surely it is in the interest not only of fairness to the railroad carriers and their employees but likewise in the interest of the American taxpayer that a portion of this business should be restored to a real American industry.

It is generally agreed that the railroads are one of the strongest arms of our national defense. Surely, if we have learned any lesson from the World War, it is that our railroad transportation facilities must be kept in perfect order, particularly since in time of war we can expect the intercoastal water carriers to desert their regular trades for the more profitable foreign trade, as they did during the World War. Mind you, this desertion took place in 1915 and 1916, before the United States entered the World War.

If you measure our coast line and our border line, you will find that we have more land border than we have water border in transcontinental United States, all of which merely emphasizes the necessity of maintaining in a state of good condition not only actual railroad equipment but also skilled personnel who are able immediately to operate trains.

Railroad employees have always responded in emergencies, both to the call of their country and to help the railroad management. An example of this was the voluntary pay reduction of 10 percent taken by all railroad employees in October 1932. In addition to this voluntary pay reduction, the employees, in many instances, liberalized the contracts entered into with the railroad carriers. It is conservative to say that this voluntary pay reduction and the liberalization of said contracts represented a saving to the railroad carriers and ultimately to the consuming public of at least $200,000,000 annually. Certainly the railroad employee comes to this Congress with clean hands, merely asking that the industry which employs them should be given a fair opportunity to meet cutthroat competition. In doing that I know they are upon a sound premise. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, my first understanding of the injustices involved in this bill came from a personal incident which happened more than 30 years ago. I was unable to find work in my home town in Kentucky, but secured a job in western Nevada, nearly 3,000 miles away. In moving the household furniture of my family the local freight agent did not have an exact quotation on the point in Nevada but he gave me the San Francisco rate, a point some 250 miles farther west. The amount involved, as I recall, was something like $200, which I paid in advance. When I went to get my furniture on its arrival in Nevada I found I had to pay an extra charge of nearly $100—not for any service rendered, but through a device known as the back-haul charge. From that day on I threw myself into a battle to eliminate this pernicious thing.

For 15 years the people of Nevada carried on an expensive and wearying struggle to free themselves from that blighting freight-rate discrimination, the back-haul charge. March 15, 1918, was the great day of victory when the shippers, the producers, the farmers of Nevada learned that we had secured terminal freight rates.

For 18 years we have been free from that discrimination, which by the passage of this bill will be returned.

I certainly have no desire to handicap in any way the hard-pressed management of the railroads of this country in their laudable efforts to create and secure more business. I certainly wish to do everything possible to promote the interests of the railroad employees.

But I cannot conceive of a situation which warrants legislation that will permit the railroads to give the shipper at Chicago the same coastal water rate that applies between New York or Baltimore and San Francisco, and then at the same time forces the consumer or producer at Reno, Winnemucca, or Elko to pay that rate plus the local rate to and from the port.

If Congress believes it the part of wisdom to move the Atlantic Ocean, by legislative action, from New York City back to Chicago, then by the same legislative action let us move the Pacific Ocean back to Reno, Winnemucca, Phoenix, or Salt Lake City. They are equally fair propositions, and we will end our controversy.

The producers, the farmers, the shippers of the West are the same type of American citizens as are those shippers of Chicago, and are entitled to the same treatment.

The Legislature of the State of Nevada, by resolution, has appealed to Congress not to pass this legislation. The State Farm Bureau of Nevada has taken similar action. The farmers, who are located in the interior, and consequently are the middlemen who would pay the proposed discriminatory freight rates, have protested against this legislation through their great national organizations, the National Farmers Union and the National Grange.

Let me quote from the railroad Coordinator's report, recently filed with this Congress, and which report is concurred in unanimously by the Interstate Commerce Commission:

All that they (the railroads) could hope to gain would be an opportunity to obtain additional traffic on a very low-cost basis of rates yielding some slight margin over the so-called out-of-pocket costs. However, such a cost is a fluctuating thing, dependent in part on whether or not it is necessary to operate more trains to carry the additional traffic. If more trains become necessary, out-of-pocket cost rises sharply. Furthermore, if the railroads are permitted to make rates on this basis the water lines must be permitted to do likewise, and in their case it often happens that it will pay to take on ballast, which pays nothing. The prospects are, therefore, that unrestrained rate warfare will leave the railroads with an out-of-pocket loss and impoverish both groups of carriers.

In my best judgment, the employees and management of the railroads in the State which I represent cannot ultimately benefit except in very slight degree by the passage of this bill, while the business interests of my State would certainly suffer by its passage, through imposition of the blight of the old back-haul charge, with no service rendered, from which we escaped 18 years ago. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. CHRISTIANSON].

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative from the Middle West I have supported and will support every measure reasonably designed to reduce transportation costs. Years ago, while a member of the Minnesota Legislature, I helped to launch the movement for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway. Later, as Governor of Minnesota, I appointed a commission to carry on the battle for a 9-foot channel in the upper Mississippi. I opposed an attempted merger of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific Railroads, for I favor competition in transportation as well as in industry. Last year I voted against the bill placing truck lines under the I. C. C., because I believe it would result in rate increases; and when the bill to subject water rates to Federal regulation comes up, I shall fight it for the same reason.

I am supporting the Pettengill bill today because to me it seems to be the one measure that promises the promptest relief from a condition that for several years has been moving industries out of the Northwest and restricting the markets for its agricultural and industrial products. [Applause.]

Inasmuch as it has become a practice of late to ascribe to public men motives of which they never were aware, let me assure you at the outset that no railroad lobbyist ever asked me to vote for this bill. The persuasion has come from my own conviction that this legislation will be beneficial to the people of Minnesota and the Northwest.

That conviction has been strengthened by resolutions of the Minnesota State Legislature, the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission, the St. Paul City Council, the Minneapolis Junior Chamber of Commerce, the St. Paul Association of Commerce, the Mankato Chamber of Commerce, the Midway Club of St. Paul, the Northfield Lions Club, the Moorhead Chamber of Commerce, the Northwest Shippers Advisory Board, and other similar organizations.

My course is supported by the Farm Bureau, by the railroad brotherhoods, and a large number of industrial and business leaders who, like myself, view with concern the creeping paralysis that has come upon the economic life of the Northwest since the Panama Canal was built.

That interoceanic channel, projected to serve the needs of national defense, has influenced the business and industry of the country profoundly. It is no exaggeration to say that it has remade the economic map of America. It brought the regions east of the Alleghenies and west of the Rockies closer together, binding them to each other with the ties of cheap water transportation, but it isolated the interior. It placed the people of my part of the country, who had to rely on expensive railroad transportation to reach the seaboard, either to buy or to sell, under a disadvantage they have not been able to surmount. It was in order to remove that disadvantage, at least in part, that they sought water outlets to the sea. It is in order to overcome that handicap that they support this measure.

The effect of the Panama Canal was not felt immediately after its completion, for the war came, taxing the capacity of both railroads and ship lines. But after 1920 there was no more war tonnage to carry. Traffic dropped to normal, and every ton thereafter carried by ships in intracoastal commerce was a ton subtracted from what would otherwise have been hauled over rails.

It came to pass that most of the heavy, slow-moving, non-perishable freight moved from the east coast to the west and from the west coast to the east by water. Fast freight, like fruit from California, continued to move by rail, but most of it was eastbound, so westbound box cars went empty.

Only the interior was dependent on the rails for both fast and slow, perishable and nonperishable freight service. Accordingly, it happened that a larger and larger percentage of the cost of supporting the railroads fell upon the agriculture, industry, and commerce of the Middle West.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman said a while back that the war period taxed both the land and water transportation. It is my recollection that the record is that the railroads alone carried not only all of the inland but all of the intercoastal traffic of the country during the war period, during which time the vessels ordinarily constituting Canal traffic had gone into European transportation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. For the reason that the tonnage carried between the United States and Europe was such as to tax the capacity of all seagoing ships.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. My point is that the railroads carried the entire load during the war period.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The entire domestic load.

The extent to which the burden of maintaining railroad freight service shifted to agriculture is strikingly indicated in the case of the Southern Pacific. Its receipts for carrying perishable and other agricultural products amounted to 13 percent of its total revenue in 1920 and 40.4 percent in 1932.

While 87 percent of the revenue available for the maintenance of railroad freight service came from nonperishable, nonagricultural tonnage in 1920, only 59.6 percent came from such tonnage in 1932. The Panama Canal had levied toll upon the Middle West.

There have, of course, been several reasons for the increase in railroad rates during the last two decades, but the chief reason was the loss of tonnage to competing forms of transportation. This has not only narrowed the base upon which operating costs and fixed charges, including taxes and interest on bonded indebtedness, had to rest, but it has definitely shifted the base toward that part of the country which is most dependent upon railroads for transportation—the Middle West.

The logical procedure for the railroads when confronted with the new water competition would have been to reduce rates to meet it. But it so happened that a Federal law stood in the way. The Interstate Commerce Act contained what is known as paragraph 1 of section 4, which provides that—

It shall be unlawful for any common carrier . . . to charge . . . any greater compensation . . . for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction.

That provision, conceived in the best of intentions, effectively barred any attempt upon the part of the railroads to meet water competition by reducing transcontinental rates, for they could not reduce such rates without also reducing rates between intermediate points correspondingly, and any such reduction would deprive the railroads of the revenue needed for operation on a solvent basis.

Section 4 was adopted before water competition had begun to be felt, while the railroads still had a virtual monopoly. In fact, the whole structure of rate regulation dates back to the period when the roads were in a position to charge all the traffic would bear. If there had been effective competition in transportation at the time the Interstate Commerce Commission was established, the history of rate regulation in this country would probably have been a different story. It was the absence of competition that created need for regulation. That regulation was designed, not to protect one form of transportation against another, but to protect the public against unreasonable rates and against discrimination between persons and communities. This was the general theory of rate regulation prevailing when the act of 1887 was passed.

Since that time the picture has changed. Seagoing ships and river barges, busses and trucks, airplanes, and pipe lines challenge the railroads on every hand. It has now become necessary not only to protect the public against transportation companies but to protect the different kinds of transportation against each other. The railroads are vital, they are essential to the very existence of the country; they must be protected against such competition as would destroy them.

There is one school of thought which holds that the best way to protect the railroads is to put their competitors under the kind of regulation to which they are subjected. To that proposal I for one object, for it would inevitably lead not to a reduction of railroad rates but to an increase of other rates. The public would be mulcted. I should prefer rather to let the railroads reduce their rates to meet water competition, even if it should lead to the establishment of through rates considerably lower than the aggregate of intermediate rates.

The steamship lines fix any through rates that suit their convenience or their need to meet competition. To leave them free while keeping the railroads hobbled is to invite the destruction of the railroads or, as an alternative, the establishment of intermediate rail rates so high as to strangle the interior of the country, which is already gasping for breath.

The objection has been made that the reduction of through rates would result in losses that would be shifted to the intermediate shipper in that local rates would be increased to supply the revenue to carry the through traffic. Such is not the case, for not only must the through rate be high enough to carry the service but the intermediate rates must be such as the Interstate Commerce Commission would approve as fair and reasonable. The local rate structure is not disturbed by the present legislation. All this measure does is to permit the railroad companies to sell the use of their unused facilities at cost, thus spreading the overhead and passing on to the through shipper a part of the burden that is tending increasingly to be borne by the intermediate shipper.

It is said that the Interstate Commerce Commission can, under existing law, grant "long and short haul" relief, and that therefore there is no necessity for enacting this legislation. That argument is plausible but not sound. At times it takes up to 3 years to get relief, and often by the time it is given the situation has so changed that the order is ineffectual to accomplish its purpose; all the petitioner has to show for his trouble is canceled checks for attorneys' fees.

The better procedure is the one which will be followed when this measure becomes a law. The railroad company will file its long-haul rates and they will become effective unless and until suspended by the Commission.

Minnesota canners, using the products of Minnesota farms, cannot sell their product in Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, and Oklahoma in competition with canners operating on either the Atlantic or the Pacific seaboard. The railroads are willing to make a through rate that would enable Minnesota to compete, but, although a long time has elapsed since relief was first sought, it has thus far not been obtained. The railroads are losing revenue, the canners have lost an outlet, and the farmers have lost a market for their product.

Minnesota formerly had an extensive paper industry, but today there are only three plants left manufacturing newsprint. New Orleans, Memphis, and St. Louis newspapers can obtain paper from Sweden and Canada at a cost lower than that of the Wisconsin and Minnesota product. After protracted and expensive hearings the Commission finally granted relief, but it was too late—many of our mills had already closed their doors.

Rates on lumber from the Pacific Northwest and from the South move to Minnesota at rates so high that the cost of building is almost prohibitive. Seattle lumber is much cheaper in New York than in Minneapolis, although the distance to New York is twice as great.

A carload of Seattle lumber can be shipped to Indiana by a combined water-rail route through the Panama Canal and an Atlantic seaport at no greater cost than by rail from Seattle direct.

The freight differential is such that Argentine corn can be unloaded at Portland or Seattle at a cost of $3 per ton less than that of corn from Iowa or Minnesota.

Instances might be multiplied indefinitely, but these are sufficient to prove the case. The landlocked interior needs lower freight rates to overcome its distance from the sea. It needs protection against the new competition brought into existence by the Panama Canal. The people of the interior can secure lower through rates without paying compensatory increases on short hauls. They demand that the artificial handicap to which they have been subjected for 16 years be removed by the repeal of a restrictive provision that can have no proper application to the transportation of today. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL].

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the railroads should be permitted to reduce their rates to competitive points only upon condition that they do not crucify the people in the interior. The great trouble with the railroads today is their rates to interior points are so high that they do not carry the proper amount of tonnage. The first consideration of a railroad in making money out of its transportation system is to secure volume of tonnage, and they have absolutely choked the interior sections by placing the freight rates so high that the people cannot afford to ship. The remedy is not in this discrimination that they are seeking through the enactment of this legislation. We have heard a great deal said today about fair play, but they do not take into consideration the shipper in speaking of fair play. It is simply a comparison between the transportation systems, and the shipper is left out of the picture. I am here today speaking for the shipper.

This bill would penalize every industry and every citizen in my congressional district. It would penalize every citizen and every industry in all these intermediate sections of the country. It has been said today that the reason why the fourth section was enacted in the first instance was because at the time it was enacted the railroads had practically a monopoly of transportation. How did they get that monopoly? They got it by choking out water transportation both on inland waters and in intercoastal traffic, and that is exactly what they want to do through the enactment of this legislation. That monopoly was secured because they had no interference from the Interstate Commerce Commission or from legislation by Congress. We would revert to that same status if we should enact this piece of legislation. Why was the fourth section enacted in the first instance? It was to prevent the discrimination the railroads had indulged in by giving a lower rate to more distant points than to points intermediate on the same line of transportation. That is discrimination. Nobody can justify discrimination. The fourth section was enacted to prevent that very thing, and today this bill is brought in for the purpose of repealing the fourth section. What would that do? The fourth section today provides:

That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this act, to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers, or of like kind of property, for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance.

The bill before us would repeal that provision. The fourth section further provides:

That this act shall not be construed as authorizing any common carrier within the terms of this act to charge or receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance.

That provision is repealed by this bill. Then the fourth section further provides:

That upon application to the Commission such common carrier may in special cases, after investigation, be authorized by the Commission to charge less for a longer than for a shorter distance for the transportation of passengers and property.

That section is repealed, because the provision now is that in order to get relief from the fourth section the railroad company must go to the Interstate Commerce Commission with an application and make an affirmative showing that it is entitled to the relief asked, but under this bill before us today it is provided that the railroad company will not have to do that. That provision is repealed. The railroad company may file its schedule of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and let that schedule remain on file for 30 days, and then, unless someone comes in and protests, it goes into effect automatically without any affirmative showing by the railroad company.

The committee, as an afterthought, proposed an amendment to the bill, as follows:

And provided further, That in any case before the Commission where there is brought in issue a lower rate or charge for the transportation of like kind of property, for a longer than for a shorter distance over the same line or route in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance, the burden of proof shall be upon the carrier to justify the rate or charge for the longer distance against any claim of a violation of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

There is a joker in that committee amendment. It says "in any case." What constitutes a case? It is not simply the filing of the schedule of rates, but a case is made when someone comes in and raises the issue as to the schedule of rates filed.

That means that every small community and every large community that wishes to object to a schedule of rates must have someone qualified to present the case for that community before the Interstate Commerce Commission and raise the issue before there is any burden upon the railroad to justify that schedule. You know and I know, as a practical matter, that traffic experts and rate experts are not to be found in all these communities. The railroads may file one schedule after another and make it absolutely impossible for the rate expert, if one were available in the smaller community, to keep up with the schedules filed. It simply annuls any effort on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to hold these railroads within bounds as to these discriminatory practices.

The fourth section also contains a provision that in exercising the authority conferred upon it in this proviso the Commission shall not permit the establishment of any charge to or from a more distant point that is not reasonably compensatory.

That provision is repealed, and it would permit the railroads to file a schedule of rates for the competing points that would pay not even the out-of-pocket cost, and the railroads must make up what they lose on these competitive rates by placing higher rates upon the interior section. But even if they should not raise the rates on the interior sections, they will discriminate between the interior and the terminal points by lowering the rates to the competitive points.

The fourth section further provides that no such authorization shall be granted on account of mere potential water competition not actually in existence. That provision is also repealed. In fact, this bill repeals the fourth section in toto. It is an absolute repeal of the fourth section, and it places the railroads back where they were in 1887 before there was any Interstate Commerce Act, and under which practice, without regulation, the railroads, in their cutthroat competition among themselves and for the purpose of running the boats off the rivers and the seas, built up that great monopoly about which something was said today. That is exactly what they want to do again.

This is not a theoretical proposition with my section of the country. We are in the status of the burnt child. We operated under those conditions, as the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] told you, until 1918, and we were suffering because of these discriminatory rates. It retarded the growth of our inland communities and cities. It gave a great advantage to the terminal cities on the coast. We know exactly what that means. That is exactly what they want to do now. You can talk until you are black in the face about the railroads not increasing the rates, but we know they will increase the rates. That is why we are opposing this legislation. It is unfair to discriminate against one community in favor of another community. The railroads must get their volume of business from the interior. They are not seagoing craft. If they would build up their traffic in the interior, they would not need this relief. [Applause.]

Railroad Coordinator Eastman is emphatically opposed to this bill.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is unanimously opposed to this bill.

There is no governmental agency endorsing this legislation.

The National Farmers Union, the National Grange, the National Farm Bureau Federation are all opposed to this bill.

The farmer is the middleman. He lives at the interior or intermediate point. The farmer lives at the noncompetitive point. The farmer is the one man who pays the freight both coming and going. He pays the freight on everything he buys and everything he sells. The farmer is the man who will be subjected to peak of rates. The farmer is the man who will be called upon to finance the railroads in their proposed cutthroat rate war with the boat lines.

When you talk of shipper, the farmer is the real shipper. He is the man who will pay the bill, and he has a right to be considered.

Passage of legislation such as the Pettengill bill will more than ever center population in the big, congested areas. These big, congested centers will be given the preferential freight rates. That is what the bill is for. It will force greater and greater population congestion in the big cities.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a comparative statement as between the fourth section as it now exists and the bill now before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

And provided further, That rates, fares, or charges existing at the time of the passage of this amendatory act by virtue of orders of the Commission or as to which application has theretofore been filed with the Commission and not yet acted upon, shall not be required to be changed by reason of the provisions of this section until the further order of or a determination by the Commission:

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent further to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a letter appearing in the hearings of the committee on this bill at pages 1034 and 1035, written by Mr. W. C. Maxwell, chief traffic officer of the Wabash Railway Co., to Hon. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, the author of this bill, showing the interest of the railroads and the author of this bill in this particular legislation, which has not been emphasized in this discussion but which is one of the big considerations back of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

CHICAGO, June 12, 1935.

HON. SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL,

Member, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: When at the plant of the Studebaker Corporation at South Bend, Ind., on the 11th, I was informed that they have arranged to send a representative to the Pacific coast to investigate as to the location there of an assembly plant for the Studebaker Corporation.

I told Mr. Paul Hoffman of the hearings before the judicial committee bearing on modification of fourth-section requirements and urged that they withhold their decision for a limited time, as it seemed certain that relief would be granted. Mr. Hoffman said he would phone you at once, therefore you have no doubt been apprised of the situation.

The erection of an assembly plant on the Pacific coast means an investment of capital that it is not necessary to invest, the throwing out of employment of people at South Bend, and further injury to the carriers. It is certain that there would be no change in the relative situation between manufacturers and dealers at intermediate points but, on the other hand, there would be bad effects to the city of South Bend and Indiana as well as to the carriers.

This concrete evidence which has no doubt been confirmed to you direct by Mr. Hoffman, is simply added evidence of what has been going on for many years—i. e., the location of plants or branch plants on the seacoasts—which, in my opinion, has resulted in material decreases in employment in the entire territory, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, and West, all States to and including the Canadian border, South including Kentucky, and as far west as the Missouri River.

I know of a case at Kansas City where they were obliged to locate a branch plant at Berkeley, Calif.

As to the carriers, the biggest taxpayers and employers of any industry, their purchases of material and supplies for the years 1926 to 1930 averaged $1,300,000,000. These figures fell to $450,000,000 in 1932 and 1933.

It must be borne in mind that this stream of lifeblood is poured into all classes of industry and although it formerly furnished livelihood for an army of people, it has been pretty stagnant for the last few years.

It is apropos to ask what the States get in the way of taxes and employment from the water lines.

I wish to direct your attention to the fact that the carriers filed an application with the Interstate Commerce Commission January 6, 1933, to reduce the rate on automobiles, set up, from Detroit, South Bend, and all producing points in the eastern section from $4.65 to $3.82 per hundredweight. They have been unable up to this time even to get a hearing on that application.

Yours very truly,

W. C. MAXWELL,
Chief Traffic Officer, Wabash Railway Co.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I represent an area which has always been a victim of discrimination as far as transportation rates are concerned. In that respect it is similar to that represented by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL], who has just addressed you, and by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

Under the provisions of the fourth section as it stands at present, we have suffered less discrimination than was formerly the case. Consequently the shippers and the public generally in the area which I represent are very apprehensive as to what may happen if this section is repealed and we go back to what were virtually the conditions before we had long- and short-haul legislation. It seems to me very obvious that any system which permits a lower charge for a long haul than for a short haul can only be defended as an emergency proposition. There is no more reason ordinarily why a railroad company should charge less for a transcontinental haul of 3,000 miles than for a haul of a few hundred miles than there is that a dry-goods merchant should charge less for 2 yards of goods than for 1 yard of goods. However, we do recognize that there are competitive conditions in the transportation field which have made it seem necessary at times to provide that in an emergency or under unusual conditions a lower rate should be charged for a longer haul. Under our present fourth section there is no railroad in the country that cannot come before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if it makes out a case and shows that the rate which it proposes to charge is reasonably compensatory, secure fourth-section relief. The report of the Commission for the year ending October 31, 1935, shows that a large number of cases involving the fourth section were heard during that time and that in a majority of those cases relief was granted. The number of applications filed during that period was 349. The number of orders entered in response to applications was 358, of which only 58 were denial orders, 110 were orders granting permanent relief, and 190 were orders authorizing temporary relief. The number of petitions for modification of orders was 345, of which 295 were granted, 20 were denied, 2 were withdrawn, and 28 are still pending. So the railroads have all the remedy they need under the present law when it comes to securing relief under the fourth section.

The situation is bad enough as it is, I think, and constitutes a very great discrimination against the section of the country in which I reside. The rates on California fruit, for instance, are just as great from the Pacific coast to Hutchinson, Kans., as they are to New York City; and this is the situation that exists on a great many articles of commerce that are shipped from coast to coast. This situation is, however, permissible now, and it is not even necessary to go before the Commission to get permission to put into force inequitable rates like that as long as the rates for the longer haul do not exceed those for the shorter.

It is proposed in the pending bill to give the railroads authority to put into effect lower rates for a long than a short haul without any order by the Commission. The shippers in the affected territory, of course, have a right to come in and bring an action under other sections of the Interstate Commerce Act, and ask for relief, but this puts the burden on the shipper, who in many cases may be a small business man who cannot afford to prosecute these actions, and in the meantime, while the action is pending, the discriminatory rates continue. We ought to leave the burden of justifying these discriminatory rates on the railroad companies themselves, for they are equipped and able to carry it. There is enough discrimination as it is under the best of circumstances in the area which will be most greatly affected by this legislation, the great middle-western farming area, an area which has always suffered so far as freight rates are concerned.

Practically every great farm organization in this country at some time or other has taken a position against the repeal of the fourth section, and some of them have urged that it be strengthened. The National Grange has repeatedly taken this position. The National Farmers Union, through its secretary, appeared before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in opposition to this measure. I have here a resolution adopted at a meeting of representatives of every farm organization in my State, the Grange, the Farm Bureau, the Equity Union, the Farmers' Cooperative Grain Dealers' Association, the Farmers' Cooperative Commission Co., the Kansas Cooperative Creamery Association, the Consumers' Cooperative Association, the Farmers' Union Jobbing Association, the Farmers' Union Managerial Association, representing, so I am informed, 90 percent of the farmers of Kansas, urging that the Pettengill bill be not enacted because of the increased discrimination which would result against agriculture.

I have here a letter from the secretary of the Southern Kansas Millers' Club. The milling industry is one of the great industries in our State, perhaps our most important manufacturing business outside of the oil industry. Kansas millers are in a very severely competitive position so far as transportation is concerned and are quite apprehensive as to what may happen if the fourth section is repealed, because they realize that, as the gentleman from Washington told you a while ago, if you repeal the fourth section, you are going to put the railroads back in the same position they were before we had long- and short-haul legislation; you are going to put them in a position where they will be able to increase still further the burden upon this great midwestern territory where we are dependent entirely upon railroad transportation so far as long-distance carrying is concerned.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. HOPE. I cannot yield.

Mr. Chairman, they are going to put again upon this area the discriminatory burdens which we had to carry before the original long- and short-haul legislation was enacted.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. The farmer is more concerned over transportation conditions in this country than anyone else, because upon him falls the burden of paying the freight both ways. He receives for his product the price at the terminal market less the freight; and when he buys he pays the price of the article plus the freight. He is more interested today in this type of legislation than any other class of our citizenship, and I sincerely hope this committee will not approve a bill further increasing his burden in this respect.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district in the intermountain section of the country which in the old days, before the long- and short-haul clause was the law, felt the evils of the rate-cutting practices of the railroads.

I was very much interested in the statement of one of the eloquent speakers today to the effect that the railroads have received no Government assistance. I know, however, that the great continental railroads were given an empire running through the great States of Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, and others. The Northern Pacific Railroad, as one instance, was given a land grant which took in every alternate section for 20 miles on each side of its right-of-way.

Today, while I stand here, that railroad company is deriving a great income from oil royalties, from coal royalties, and from the sale of timber and public lands due to the subsidy given them in completing that railroad out there.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is it not true that the remaining public lands increased in value by the railroad's going through, and is it not also true that the section of the United States that has prospered the least since 1910 is this entire territory? It actually declined in population?

Mr. WHITE. There is a very good reason for that.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; there is.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Members of the Committee if there is any justification for charging more for hauling freight to the intermountain section, Colorado, Idaho, Utah, and Nevada, than to haul freight 300 miles farther to the coast, then charge a back-haul into these intermountain States? For years we tried to get a just rate. The old rate before there was a long- and short-haul section in the Interstate Commerce Act permitted the railroads to charge a rate to the coast and then back again into the intermountain section. This was at the expense of the country I have been talking about and which the gentleman says has not increased in population.

Let me remind the Committee that the traffic which goes to the intermountain section originates not on the Atlantic coast but in the Middle West. We draw our farm implements from Illinois. We draw our corn products from Illinois, our shoes from St. Louis. All this material comes into Idaho, and we are charged more for hauling that freight into Idaho than is being charged to carry it to the coast, and if this bill becomes a law we must pay in addition freight charges back to us again. This bill will make a desert of our country and destroy the business of the great intermountain section of the United States. For that reason we are opposed to any change in the Interstate Commerce Act. The grange in my State, all the farmer organizations, business organizations, and the chambers of commerce are on record opposing this bill. Therefore I ask that the Committee vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, when the Panama Canal was built there was an understanding in the Middle Western States that there would be a compensation in rail rates to permit the shippers in the Middle West to compete with the Canal. We bore our fair share of the cost of that Canal. But shortly after the Canal was built, which was during the period of the war, particularly when the existing law was enacted, there was no real competition between rail and water at that time, because every ship that was available was being used for service in the Atlantic trade. We needed every inch of shipping space that we could get, both on rail and water; so that the disastrous effects of this revision did not become apparent until after the war.

Mr. Chairman, the situation has changed vastly in the last 20 years. Truck competition, which was then unknown, has sprung up, and in itself is one of the best guaranties against rates becoming too high. They act as a check by the competition which they furnish. The constant breaking down of our railways has had a most unfortunate result in the effect upon the purchasing power of the people, and we feel this particularly in the Middle West. We get a double-barreled effect there. Our industries have been constantly moving away from the Middle West, where they should logically be located on account of its geographical position, to the coasts because they could not compete on transportation costs.

Mr. Chairman, this bill will permit us to simply have a fair basis of competition. It is not discrimination in favor of the Middle West, but, on the contrary, gives us only an even break and an opportunity to continue to do business nationally. Railway labor plays a very important part in stabilizing the wages and therefore the purchasing power of the whole country.

I represent a city which is a very important railway center in this country. As a matter of fact, it was from St. Paul that the transcontinental railroads of the North originated and pushed westward to the Pacific coast. We know the healthy effect of stability of railway labor on the whole labor and industrial structure of this country. Their credit is of the highest order, and because of this their wages turn over at a considerably greater rate than does that, for instance, of the low pay of truck drivers and the uncertain and seasonable pay of those engaged in water-transportation work.

A weakening of the financial structure of our railroads has a very serious and dangerous result in the whole investment and financial field. The stability of all insurance companies, and therefore insurance policies, because of the heavy investment of insurance reserves in railroad securities is threatened. Depositors' money in banks is vitally affected by railway investments. A heavy proportion of people's life savings, trust funds, and institutional endowments is invested in railroad bonds. Therefore the general welfare of the people at large demands the sound economic position of our railroads, and to insure this they must be able to meet on a reasonable basis the rates of competitive transportation systems.

The advocates of water transportation I think are under a misapprehension. I should like to say here that I have always been an ardent advocate of developing our waterways. What I have seen in Europe and the Orient, where they have utilized every possible source of water transportation, convinces me that we will have to do the same thing in this country eventually. I think in just a very few years we are going to strain the railroads to their very limit of capacity in the shipping of the merchandise of this country. I think we are going to use in addition every possible river and waterway that may be developed. As I previously stated, I have always been an ardent advocate of developing our waterways. I still hold to that opinion, but I do not believe that anything which will help business conditions in general is going to hurt the waterways. If we develop industries—and I am talking now particularly of the Middle West—if we develop our industrial life and develop our factories through permitting a larger field of distribution, the water carriers are bound to get their share, and they will prosper in direct proportion to such development. This is not competition in the ordinary sense of the word between rail and the water carriers. This is not going to take business away from them. It is going to create additional business in which they will share. All that this bill really does is to give the railroads an even break with these other competitive forms of transportation that have arisen in recent years and which are unregulated as to rates. They should be brought under exactly the same control as are the railroads. All transportation must be taken as a system, and all of the component parts of that system ought to be under the same regulation. All this bill does is to give the railroads the same opportunity that the water carriers now have. It also puts them in the same position as the trucking concerns.

Let us consider the probable effect of the Pettengill long- and short-haul bill upon the upper Mississippi River, for instance. It should be borne in mind—

First. That the railways could establish rates no lower than absolutely necessary to meet the water competition and obtain a fair share of the available traffic. This would generally mean a rate between water ports via rail somewhat higher than the water-carrier rate, this because of the more frequent and superior rail service. If the railway rate was so low as to jeopardize the water service—such as obtaining all or practically all of the traffic for the railways, then under section 3—the discrimination part of the act and not proposed to be repealed—would come into play because the low rate to the point beyond would be lower than absolutely necessary and the higher rate to the intermediate point would be unjustly discriminatory.

Second. That it is the general practice of the common carriers on the Mississippi—such as the Federal Barge Lines—to make their rates 20 percent less than the rail rates. Except where cutthroat competition occurs between the water carriers themselves, few of the water rates of common carriers on the inland waterways are made without any reference to those of the rail lines. In those instances where the railways have applied for long- and short-haul relief to meet the competition of rates independently established by the river boats or barges, such rail rates have invariably been on a higher basis than the water rates.

Third. Unless the railways are in a position to promptly readjust their rates between river ports, and contiguous territories, to obtain a fair share of the traffic available, and which is exactly what the water carriers are now freely permitted to do, then it means a monopoly of such traffic for the water lines, except where the railway finds that the loss of revenue to the intermediate points does not offset the gain from the competitive traffic to the points beyond, and therefore does not violate the long- and short-haul rule.

Fourth. There is nothing in the present act to indicate that it was ever the intention of Congress to have such act administered or interpreted so as to legislate the railways out of participation in traffic competitive with water lines through a refusal to permit railways to readjust their rates so as to meet the competition confronting them. On the contrary, the law says that it is the policy to promote in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

This bill is sound, fair, and plain justice. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

THE PETTENGILL BILL TO AMEND PARAGRAPH (1) OF SECTION 4 OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my approval of the Pettengill bill to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, and present some of my reasons therefor.

Samuel O. Dunn, editor of Railway Age, recently is quoted as having said that there is very real danger of Government ownership of railways, and that more than one-third of the railroad industry of the United States actually is in bankruptcy, railway operating expenses having increased $300,000,000 within the last 3 years.

Railroad abandonment in the past 2 years, as authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission, totaled approximately 5,000 miles. If the railroads are to be abandoned, or taken over by the Government for operation, the first effect will be felt on the farm and by labor, and the final effect on the people of this country as a whole would be a matter of grave concern.

In 1931 the Kansas railways paid in that State taxes amounting to $8,918,820, of which $4,648,340, or 52.1 percent, was for public schools; $1,683,383, or 18.9 percent, was for highways; and $2,587,097, or 29 percent, was for other governmental purposes. Due largely to decreased traffic and revenues, including the large amounts lost to subsidized water and motor carriers, railway taxes in Kansas had for the year of 1934 dropped to $6,752,798, but still a very large sum.

Besides contributing heavily to the maintenance of Kansas schools, highways, and other governmental purposes in that State, the railroads employed 30,744 Kansans, the wages of whom amounted to $51,405,772, and purchases of materials within the State amounted to $4,896,031. They operated 9,758 miles of road, and their plant and equipment value, or fixed capital, was $965,470,051.

Their ability to pay taxes, employ people, and purchase materials depends largely upon the amount of traffic they handle and the revenues therefrom. Manifestly, if the Kansas railways are put in a position to again handle traffic which has been lost to competing and subsidized forms of transportation that will be of benefit to all Kansans.

The purpose of the Pettengill bill is to permit the transcontinental rail carriers to compete in some measure with steamship lines operating between the Atlantic and Pacific through the Panama Canal. A substantial volume of railway traffic consists of fruits and vegetables from the West to the East, as well as grain and grain products in the same direction. This results in a very large movement of empty cars from the East to the West. It is very evident that the railroads should be permitted to fill these empty cars with goods manufactured in the East which are now moving by water to the Pacific coast. Any profit thus acquired would help to bear the burden of operating and maintaining the railway lines which are so indispensable to the vast agricultural interests of the interior country.

It is common knowledge that by far the major part of revenues of the railroads must be used to pay the operating costs, interest, and taxes, and the diversion of traffic to steamships and highways must either result in an increase in freight rates or Government ownership to make up deficits out of taxation.

The amendment to the Interstate Commerce Commission Act will permit the railroads to make such rates as may return to them a considerable volume of the freight traffic which means more tonnage for the railroads to handle, more trains run, more men employed in train service, yards, shops, and track maintenance, and more materials and supplies purchased and used; all of which will work to the advantage of the interior States through which the transcontinental railroads operate.

Some opponents of the Pettengill bill seem to fear that transcontinental railroads may put in effect rates on wheat from the Pacific Northwest which would be detrimental and ruinous to the milling and grain interest of the interior States, but such roads as the Missouri Pacific, Santa Fe, Union Pacific, Rock Island, Southern Pacific, and the northern lines have the greatest investment and enjoy the greatest business in these interior States, and all of them depend largely for their prosperity upon the production of agriculture and agricultural products which originate in the interior territory and general business resulting therefrom, and it seems obvious that to put in effect any rates which would be detrimental and ruinous to the interior country would be a suicidal step; that anything which injured the interior country would at the same time be equally injurious to the carriers serving the territory.

Furthermore, under the terms of the Pettengill bill it will be impossible to institute any rates for transcontinental traffic which would be detrimental to any locality. The Interstate Commerce Commission still has power to prescribe maximum and minimum rates and to see that no railroad shall put into effect at competitive points rates so low as to add to the cost of moving freight to and from interior or intermediate points.

The maritime associations have objected strenuously to the bill, but it has been pointed out that the intercoastal common carriers, which are the object of their solicitude, are shown to have paid only five-hundredths of 1 percent of their revenues in taxes—that is, 50 cents out of each thousand dollars taken in—whereas the railroads pay seventy or eighty dollars per thousand dollars. It will be seen, therefore, that the tax contribution for the support of Government made by the railways per dollar of revenue is approximately 160 times greater than is contributed by the intercoastal common carriers.

It is certain that the intercoastal and other water carriers who have diverted so much traffic from the railways have not made up any part of the loss in taxes in Kansas mentioned at the outset, for such water lines pay but little in the shape of taxes anywhere, and certainly none in the State of Kansas.

I wish to quote excerpts of a letter recently received by me from a resident of Kansas, who, so far as I know, is not connected in any way with the railroads or any other transportation systems, as follows:

I am convinced that the Commerce Act should be amended to relax the very stringent requirements which have worked a hardship on the transcontinental railroads, and thus enable them to increase revenues without harm to the agriculture of the Middle West. Kansas is vitally interested in the railroads and their welfare, and as in the past, this inland country shall have to mainly rely upon them for transportation. You know as well as I, if not better than I, to what extent the products of Kansas are moved to market by the railroads, and it is inconceivable that the volume of our commodities can be handled as satisfactorily and with the dispatch necessary and for the distance required, under any other mode. Hence the ability to render required services is of prime importance to Kansas, and unless the railroads are permitted to handle all the traffic they can to measurably meet competition and to more fully utilize their facilities in profitable business, their ability to serve the Middle West may be very seriously impaired. As I understand the problem, a certain flexibility as to rates will enable the railroads to increase revenues without detriment to the Middle West, and hence I most earnestly urge that legislation to that end be enacted. Otherwise the prospect seems to be that the Middle West will either have to pay increased tariffs or see the railroads go under Government management, either of which would be calamitous, and both of which may, I believe, be avoided by the exercise of common sense.

These are some of the reasons why I favor the Pettengill bill. I choose the taxpaying railways in preference to the tax-spending water carriers. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILCOX, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3263) to amend paragraph (1) of section 4 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended February 28, 1920 (U. S. C., title 49, sec. 4), had come to no resolution thereon.

THE LONG AND SHORT HAUL FROM THE SHIPPERS' STANDPOINT

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, in my speech on the long and short haul—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4126—I spoke of it as primarily a shippers' bill rather than a railroad bill. That, of course, is an accurate description of the bill. The railroads cannot benefit unless the shippers benefit.

It has occurred to me that it will be of interest to list some of the large shippers and shippers' organizations which favor the bill. They come from nearly every State in the Union and represent agriculture, industry, and raw materials.

SENATE

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1936

(Legislative day of Monday, Feb. 24, 1936)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Friday, March 20, 1936, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

COORDINATION OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Special Committee on Reorganization of the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,

Washington, March 20, 1936.

The Honorable the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: Last October I began holding some conversations with interested and informed persons concerning what appealed to me as the necessity of making a careful study of the organization of the executive branch of the Government.

Many new agencies have been created during the emergency, some of which will, with the recovery, be dropped or greatly curtailed, while others, in order to meet the newly realized needs of the Nation, will have to be fitted into the permanent organization of the executive branch. One object of such a study would be to determine the best way to fit the newly created agencies or such parts of them as may become more or less permanent into the regular organization. To do this adequately and to assure the proper administrative machinery for the sound management of the executive branch, it is, in my opinion, necessary also to study as carefully as may be the existing regular organization. Conversations on this line were carried on by me during November and December, and I then determined to appoint a committee which would assist me in making such a study, with the primary purpose of considering the problem of administrative management. It is my intention shortly to name such a committee, with instructions to make its report to me in time so that the recommendations which may be based on the report may be submitted to the Seventy-fifth Congress.

The Senate already has established a special committee to consider certain aspects of this same problem, and I write to you to ask that the Senate, through its special committee, cooperate with me and with the committee which I shall name in making this study, in order that duplication of effort in the task of research may be avoided and to the end that it may be as fruitful as possible.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

LIEV EIRIKSSON—PRESENTATION OF PAINTING BY NORWEGIAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in Statuary Hall in the Capitol at 11 o'clock this morning ceremonies were held at which the Norwegian Minister to the United States and Dr. Bjerkke, a very distinguished Norwegian who made the trip here for that purpose, presented to the Congress of the United States a very beautiful painting which is a copy of a larger painting that hangs in Oslo, Norway, representing the discovery of America by Liev Eiriksson.

As part of that ceremony, the Norwegian Minister presented to me, as a Member of this body and representing it in the exercises, a very beautiful little brochure which is printed by hand on real parchment. It contains the inscription which has been placed on the painting donating it to the Congress, and, on the opposite page, it contains the names of the donors who represent, in part, the official life of the Norwegian Kingdom.

I ask unanimous consent that at this point not only the inscription but the names of the donors may be printed in the RECORD and that the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to place this document in the archives of the Senate for future preservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary of the Senate, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Kentucky, is instructed to preserve the document in the archives of the Senate, and the inscription and names of the donors will be printed in the RECORD.

The inscription and names of the donors are as follows:

The painting "Liev Eiriksson Discovers America, A. D. 1000", which was painted by the Norwegian artist Prof. Christian Krohg in 1893 and copied by his son, Per Krohg, in 1935-36, has been presented to the United States Congress and placed in the Capitol Building, Washington, D. C., today March 23, 1936. It is a gift from the undersigned Norwegian friends of the United States of America:

C. T. Hambro, Speaker of the Storting, Oslo; Halvdan Koht, Secretary of State, Oslo; Toh. Ludw. Mowinckel, late Prime Minister, Bergen; Wilhelm v. Munthe, of Morgenstjerne, Norwegian Minister to the United States, Washington, D. C.; Alf Bjerkke, Dr. Fng., Oslo; Gustav Henriksen, president of the N. A. L., Oslo; Fac. S. RELIEF OF FLOOD SUFFERERS

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, so many inquiries have been made as to what the various agencies of the Federal Government are really in position to do to help bring relief to those suffering as the result of the recent floods that, at the request of the Massachusetts delegation, I have prepared a statement on the subject, which I request to have inserted in the RECORD.

I also desire at this point to introduce a bill in my own name and that of the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] providing for an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Under existing law, manufacturers and other industrialists, as well as home owners and farmers, may borrow a sufficient amount of money to represent the actual cost of repairs of damage done to their homes or to their factories. There is no provision of law which permits the loaning of money to manufacturers for repairing damage to equipment and machinery and appurtenances.

Furthermore, the present law requires such loans to be made through a nonprofit corporation, and that method has not worked out satisfactorily.

After consulting the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, an amendment has been drafted which removes the necessity of borrowing through a nonprofit corporation and permits loans to be made, under proper limitations, for repairs to equipment and machinery that may have been damaged by reason of the floods; also equipment that farmers may have lost by reason of the floods.

I ask permission to have the statement printed in the RECORD, as well as the bill; and I call the committee's attention to the importance of early action on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The statement and bill will be printed in the RECORD, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statement is as follows:

FEDERAL AGENCIES TO AID FLOOD VICTIMS

The Massachusetts delegation in the Congress met with Senator WALSH at the Capitol today to discuss just what assistance the Federal Government was in a position to render to relieve damage and financial losses suffered as a result of the New England floods. The following report was issued to the press after it was submitted to the congressional delegation:

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation under existing law may make loans to the full amount of the new farm buildings or home dwellings that may be necessary in all cases of injury as a result of the flood.

Furthermore, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under existing law may make loans to the amount necessary for disbursements for all necessary repairs on houses and farm buildings. The only requirements under existing law being that the land must be free of encumbrances or the owner must be in a position to subordinate his present lien to the new moneys advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The same provision of law applies to factories as applies to private dwellings and farms, namely, all necessary money for reconstruction and repairing is available, providing the manufacturer is in a position to subordinate his previous liens.

The existing law, however, requires that all such loans must be made through nonprofit corporations. Much difficulty has been experienced setting up nonprofit corporations under this law because of conflict between State laws, and the present law also limits loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the repairing and replacing of buildings and structures.

An amendment will be introduced in the Senate today by Senators WALSH and LONERGAN enlarging the present law by doing away with loans through nonprofit corporations and providing for loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to include equipment, machinery, and other appurtenances necessary for the proper use of the buildings or plants. This proposed change will apply to farmers, home owners, and particularly manufacturing concerns.

The bill introduced would make available $25,000,000 for this purpose.

THE FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

Senator WALSH reported that the existing Federal Housing Administration law was ample for making rehabilitation loans. However, the provision of title I of the Federal Housing Act expires on April 1, and it will be necessary to continue the present law in order to make rehabilitation loans provided for under title I of this act.

He reported that immediate steps had been taken in both branches of the Congress to pass pending legislation providing for the continuation of title I, which not only permits home owners to borrow for rehabilitation purposes but also manufacturers up to $50,000.

BRIDGES AND PUBLIC STRUCTURES

There may be some question about the right to rebuild bridges across the Connecticut River and the Merrimac River, which are in part navigable streams, and therefore subject to congressional control.

Congressman HOLMES introduced in the House and Senators WALSH and COOLIDGE in the Senate, a bill providing necessary authority to receive loans for bridges, highways, and public buildings.

Ample funds are available under existing appropriations and will be allotted to State, county, and municipalities for the reconstruction of bridges, highways, and public buildings which have been destroyed by the flood. All Federal allotments to the States for highway purposes may be used by the State authorities for construction of bridges. A $9,000,000 allotment to Massachusetts is now available for this work.

RELIEF

As to immediate relief, the Red Cross, Public Works Administration, and local authorities are already rendering all possible assistance in every section where there is need, and ample funds will be available.

CLEARING AND REMOVING DEBRIS

Senator WALSH has been assured that ample numbers of P. W. A. workers and young men from the C. C. C. camps will be assigned to do this work immediately, and this will be done without any expense to the owners whose properties have been damaged by the flood. The reports received from the stricken areas commend highly the work that has already been done by these agencies.

The bill (S. 4328) relating to the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make rehabilitation loans for the repair of damages caused by floods or other catastrophes, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to nonprofit corporations for the repair of damages caused by floods or other catastrophes, and for other purposes", approved April 13, 1934, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered, through such existing agency or agencies as it may designate, to make loans to corporations, partnerships, or individuals for the purpose of financing the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of structures or buildings, including such equipment, appliances, fixtures, machinery, and appurtenances as shall be deemed necessary or appropriate by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and for the purpose of financing the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of water, irrigation, gas, electric, sewer, drainage, flood-control, communication, or transportation systems damaged or destroyed by earthquake, conflagration, tornado, cyclone, hurricane, flood, or other catastrophe in the years 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, and 1937, and for the purpose of financing the acquisition of structures, buildings, or property in replacement of structures, buildings, or property destroyed or rendered unfit for use by reason of the catastrophe, when such repair, construction, reconstruction, rehabilitation, or acquisition is deemed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to be economically useful or necessary, said loans to be made upon sufficient security.

"Obligations accepted hereunder shall be collateralized—

"(a) In the case of loans for the acquisition, repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of private property, by the obligations of the owner of such property, secured by a paramount lien, except as to taxes and special assessments not delinquent, on the property to be acquired, repaired, constructed, reconstructed, or rehabilitated, or on other property of the borrowers;

"(b) In case of loans for the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of privately owned water, gas, electric, communication, or transportation systems, by the obligations of the owners of such water, gas, electric, communication, or transportation systems, secured by a lien thereon; and

"(c) In case of loans for the repair, construction, reconstruction, or rehabilitation of property of municipalities or political subdivisions of States or of their public agencies, including public-school boards and public-school districts, and water, irrigation, sewer, drainage, and flood-control districts, by an obligation of such municipality, political subdivision, public agency, board, or district, payable from any source, including taxation or tax-anticipation warrants.

"The collateral obligations shall have maturities not exceeding 10 years in case of loans made under paragraph (a) of this act, and not exceeding 20 years in case of loans under paragraphs (b) and (c) of this act.

"The Corporation shall prescribe such regulations as will most effectively expedite the repair, construction, reconstruction, and rehabilitation provided for by this act and effectively carry out the emergency-relief purposes of this act.

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, disbursement may be made at any time prior to January 23, 1939, on any commitment made by the Corporation under the terms of this act, as amended.

"The aggregate of loans made under this act shall not exceed $25,000,000."

That the title of the said act is amended to read as follows: "An act authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans for the repair of damages caused by floods or other catastrophes, and for other purposes."

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Pittsburgh area has again experienced high waters which have been above flood stage on an average of once a year for the past 80 years. The vast population of this area, which comprises portions of the three States of Ohio, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, have suffered annual devastations because of runaway rivers. Millions of dollars' worth of property has been destroyed, lives have been lost, public services have been disrupted, and health has been menaced by these annual inundations. This year the condition has been the worst in half a century. It is unthinkable that we shall permit this tragedy to continue without thoughtful consideration as to how we may best protect the citizens of this country living in this area. Flood protection based on Federal funds and scientific knowledge is now absolutely imperative.

The time to secure adequate flood protection is now at hand. Exhaustive studies and plans made throughout many years by the Army engineers, who have been in charge of our rivers and harbors for over a century, are now available. Heretofore, the interest of the Federal Government in flood control has been concentrated primarily on the lower Mississippi River, but at present considerable interest in flood control has been extended to other localities and streams. The important Tygart Reservoir in West Virginia is a step in this direction. Thirteen additional reservoirs have been studied and recommended in this area by two important Government boards—the Mississippi Valley Committee of the Public Works Administration and the Water Planning Commission of the National Resources Board. This project has also been approved as "meritorious" by the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. With the endorsement of such important scientific agencies, it seems that the time has now come when funds for these additional reservoirs should be allotted and the work begun.

Mr. President, the system of 13 flood storage and navigation reservoirs in the headwaters of the Allegheny, Monongahela, and upper Ohio Rivers, studied by the United States engineers and included in the report of the National Resources Board, if constructed, will bestow priceless social benefits upon millions of inhabitants of several States who dwell within the watersheds of the uncontrolled streams.

These benefits will consist of more than alleviation of floods. They will include, also, adequate navigation, water supply in periods of low water, great dilution of acids, sewage, and other wastes in domestic water supplies, with consequent betterment of public health, and, in some instances, possible future power development.

Mr. President, the contemplated plan of operation of the Tygart project is, in general, as follows: Beginning at the first of each calendar year the reservoir will be practically empty, from which time on it will be operated solely for flood-control purposes by retention individually of all flood flows when the Pittsburgh gage indicates the approach of a flood stage, and by the prompt release of impounded water from the reservoir when the Monongahela River at Pittsburgh is below the flood stage.

The Tygart River project is one of the public-works projects authorized under the National Industrial Recovery Act, and consequently its value as a means of relieving unemployment and stimulating industry is important. The Tygart project will eliminate floods from the lower Tygart Valley and alleviate flood conditions in the entire reach of the Monongahela Valley. Work on this project has been under way for some time. Its construction is giving steady employment to several thousand men for 2 or 3 years and consuming great quantities of materials, such as sand, gravel, cement, lumber, steel, machinery, and tools, thus indirectly providing additional employment.

Mr. President, there are nine other reservoirs in the initial system as designed by the United States engineers and included in plans of the Flood Commission for the Monongahela and Allegheny watersheds. Four additional reservoirs are planned for the upper Ohio Valley in Kentucky, West Virginia, and western Pennsylvania, making a total of 13 in all.

In its studies for the proposed system of reservoirs in the Allegheny and Monongahela Valleys the Pittsburgh Flood Commission made the following statement on the subject of benefits:

A summary of the minimum benefits calculated by the commission is as follows:

Benefits to property of all classes from flood control	$65,560,000
Benefit to navigation	5,000,000
Low-water benefits:
Hydroelectric	750,000
Water supply	1,500,000
Sewage dilution	16,000,000
Total	87,810,000

In addition there is a regional benefit, or removal of restraint to the development of these valleys, which is very real although not readily calculable. Various studies lead to the conclusion that this benefit is at least as great as the combined calculable benefits. The total benefits are therefore approximately twice that stated, or say $175,000,000.

The report of the Mississippi Valley Committee to the Public Works Administration of October 1, 1934, contains the following statement:

The total estimated cost of these 13 reservoirs is about $70,100,000. The total annual cost (4 percent on the investment plus annual operation and maintenance cost) is estimated at $3,000,000. Estimated annual tangible benefits total about $3,900,000; the ratio of benefits to cost is about 1.3 to 1 without considering the many intangible benefits.

The Federal Government has been interested in these matters not only in flood control but in navigation water supply as well, both being pertinent in connection with navigation improvements on the Ohio River system as well as elsewhere. The United States Army Engineers made various reports, the first being submitted to Congress by the Secretary of War on January 18, 1913. This is contained in House Document No. 1289, Sixty-second Congress, third session.

Mr. President, flood control in this area did not appear to have been actively considered again by Federal agencies for some time, when by an act of Congress, approved May 31, 1924, investigation of the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers was authorized with a view to control of their floods. This investigation was made in cooperation with the State of Pennsylvania as provided for in the act and a report prepared by the United States Engineer Office, Pittsburgh, Pa., on July 10, 1928.

The latest report on flood control for the Pittsburgh area was submitted by Maj. W. D. Styer, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, district engineer, on August 24, 1933, as a result of a request made by the newly created Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works. Growing out of public hearings on that report, the construction of the Tygart River Reservoir was authorized.

Mr. President, in addition to urging immediate consideration of the construction of reservoirs in accordance with long-standing plans of Army Engineers, I wish to offer an amendment to the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill for 1937, page 48, line 4, to strike out "$1,099,152", in the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,125,000." I ask that the amendment lie on the table until the bill shall come before us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be received, and will lie on the table and be printed.

BENEFIT PAYMENTS UNDER THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and I wish to make a brief statement in connection with it.

I am presenting a resolution seeking certain information from the Secretary of Agriculture respecting benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I am asking for the names of all producers receiving benefit payments in excess of $10,000 per annum in any one year.

It seems to me this information is highly pertinent for study in connection with the new tax bill which must include $500,000,000 of new taxes to pay new benefits under the new law, as well as $250,000,000 to pay commitments remaining over from the old law.

These records are not open to inspection. I suppose it is the only existing secret disbursement of premiums, bonuses, or subsidies. We know something about the average benefit payments; but the information is entirely abstract, and except as we know to what extent the general averages are weighted down by large, individual payments, it is impossible to interpret these statistics. Let me make it wholly plain that I am not questioning the integrity of the disbursements. I am asking only for information bearing upon the public policy involved.

Let me illustrate. I understand the average corn-hog benefit payment in Iowa is under $400. But I know, for example, about one corn-hog contract in another State where the beneficiary was paid $219,825 in 2 years for not raising 14,587 hogs on 445 acres.

Again, I understand the average cotton contract throughout the South is under $1,500. But I know, for example, about one cotton contract which paid $168,000 for not planting 7,000 acres.

Again, I understand the average wheat contract in Kansas runs in the neighborhood of $800. But I know, for example, of one such contract—although in this instance I know neither the State nor the acreage—which produced 65 checks for a total of $78,638 in 2 years.

It seems to me that we should have full information regarding all larger payments of this nature. Therefore I submit the resolution calling for reports on payments above $10,000, and I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 265) was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate forthwith the name and address and the amount paid to each producer, exceeding $10,000, in each calendar year pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended.

INVASIONS OF RIGHTS OF FREE SPEECH, ASSEMBLY, AND COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 266), which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor is authorized and directed to make an investigation of violations of the rights of free speech and assembly and undue interference with the right of labor to organize and bargain collectively. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation for the enactment of any remedial legislation it may deem necessary.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ and to call upon the executive departments for clerical and other assistants, to require by subpoena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $——, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION IN WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report recently made to Hon. Harry L. Hopkins by Mr. Alan Johnstone on charges of political exploitation of the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia, and a release and certain exhibits which accompany the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE WORKS PROGRAM—WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION—W. P. A. ADMINISTRATOR HOPKINS FINDS NO IRREGULARITIES IN WEST VIRGINIA

Not a person on relief rolls in West Virginia obtained work through political influence on Works Progress Administration projects, and all appointments to administrative places were made on a basis of merit, over 60 percent of such appointees having no political endorsements. Works Progress Administrator Harry L. Hopkins today wrote Senator RUSH D. HOLT, in transmitting a report of the investigation made at Mr. Holt's request on the conditions governing Works Progress Administration work in that State.

The report of the investigators exonerates Senator NEELY, Mr. Holt's colleague, of the charge that these appointments were used by him to build up a political machine, the investigation having developed that Mr. NEELY was in the Orient on official business during the formative period of the West Virginia organization.

With the report Mr. Hopkins also made public a letter to F. W. McCullough, Works Progress Administrator for West Virginia, sustaining the dismissal of M. S. Holt, Jr., brother of the Senator, and rescinding an order for his reinstatement to the position of district engineer in the Parkersburg area. In this letter Mr. McCullough was further advised to notify W. J. Gates, chairman of a Democratic county committee, to choose between that and his position in the Fairmont district office.

"As the report indicates," Mr. Hopkins wrote, "the charge that relief clients were forced to get their jobs through political sources proved to be totally unfounded. There is no evidence of a single case out of the thousands employed from the relief rolls having secured their work through political influence.

"Likewise, the evidence indicates that the administrative staff have been appointed on merit and on the basis of their qualifications to do the job, and that, while recommendations have been made from political sources, these recommendations have been given only the same consideration that would be given to any other citizen of West Virginia.

"The fact is that over 60 percent of all administrative employees had no recommendation of any sort from any public official or person connected with any political party, and that the administrative staff is made up of competent, able, and efficient workers.

"There is evidence that some attempts have been made to bring political influence to bear upon these workers, and appropriate administrative action has been taken in regard to several minor officials in our office who cooperated in these attempts."

Senator HOLT, in a speech in the Senate, February 26, charged that because he "made a speech against W. P. A. on Monday, my brother was fired out of it on Friday." The report of the investigators shows that 3 days before the Senator made his speech his dismissal had been recommended by Mr. McCullough as the result of an inquiry made into reports of "maladministration in Parkersburg." This inquiry, made by the direction of Wayne Coy, field representative of the Administration, showed that Holt admits having assumed charge of the Parkersburg area, where the investigators found "(1) prosecution of unapproved projects, (2) overloading of projects with supervisory personnel, (3) improper placing of administrative personnel on project pay rolls."

The investigation further developed that "early in February of this year subscriptions had been solicited and taken from the employees of the Parkersburg office to pay the expenses of broadcasting a speech delivered by Senator HOLT at St. Marys, W. Va., on February 7."

Mr. Hopkins' letters to Senator HOLT and to State Administrator McCullough, sustaining the dismissal of Senator HOLT's brother and advising as to other changes, follow with the report of the investigators:

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1936.

Hon. RUSH D. HOLT,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HOLT: I am enclosing a copy of the report of the investigation made in response to your request to me of February 15 and of your charges in your addresses to the Senate relative to the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia.

As the report indicates, the charge that relief clients were forced to get their jobs through political sources proved to be totally unfounded. There is no evidence of a single case out of the thousands employed from the relief rolls having secured their work through political influence. Likewise, the evidence indicates that the administrative staff have been appointed on merit and on the basis of their qualifications to do the job; and that while recommendations have been made from political sources these recommendations have been given only the same consideration that would be given to any other citizen of West Virginia. The fact is that over 60 percent of all administrative employees had no recommendation of any sort from any public official or person connected with any political party, and that the administrative staff is made up of competent, able, and efficient workers.

There is evidence that some attempts have been made to bring political influence to bear upon these workers, and appropriate administrative action has been taken in regard to several minor officials in our office who cooperated in these attempts.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY L. HOPKINS, Administrator.

WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1936.

Mr. F. W. McCULLOUGH,

Administrator, Works Progress Administration,

44 Capitol City Building, Charleston, W. Va.

DEAR MR. McCULLOUGH: Several days ago you dismissed Mr. M. S. Holt, Jr., as district engineer in the Parkersburg, W. Va., district office of the Works Progress Administration. Mr. Aubrey Williams wired you to reinstate him pending investigation of charges made by his brother, Senator RUSH D. HOLT, that his dismissal was an act of political discrimination on your part. This letter is to inform you that on the basis of the investigation made by this Administration your dismissal of Mr. M. S. Holt, Jr., is sustained and the order for his reinstatement is hereby rescinded.

This letter also approves the action taken by you in informing Mr. W. J. Gates, assistant supervisor, division of operations, Fairmont district office, that he will have to give up his position with the W. P. A. or resign as head of the Democratic County Committee. Approval is also given to your request to Mr. Sutton Sharp, administrative assistant, Fairmont district office, that he give up his part-time position with the Fairmont newspaper or resign from his position with the Works Progress Administration. Your action in dismissing Mr. Dorr Tucker, administrative assistant in the Charleston district office, and Mr. M. D. Dean, acting supervisor of the division of finance and statistics in the Parkersburg district office, and in accepting the resignation of Mr. Mose Darst, as administrative assistant in the Fairmont district office, and Mr. Leo Casey, supervisor of labor relations in the Elkins district office, is approved.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY L. HOPKINS, Administrator.

REPORT TO HARRY L. HOPKINS, ADMINISTRATOR, BY ALAN JOHNSTONE, FIELD REPRESENTATIVE, ON CHARGES OF POLITICAL EXPLOITATION OF THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION OF WEST VIRGINIA

In response to the request of Senator RUSH D. HOLT, as contained in his letter of February 15 to you, and in his addresses in the Senate, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 17, 24, 25, and 26, and in compliance with your direction, I have just completed an investigation of the Works Progress Administration of West Virginia, with particular reference to Senator HOLT's charges. With three associates I have devoted 10 days to the investigation, 8 of which were spent in the State.

The charges, as stated in the letter and the addresses, may be grouped as follows: That the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia has been subjected to political exploitation and domination; that the administrative and supervisory cost there is unduly absorbing the funds appropriated to provide work for persons on relief; that the State administrator is unfit to hold his office.

I. POLITICAL EXPLOITATION AND DOMINATION

It is charged hereunder that the giving of relief or employment to persons on relief in West Virginia is on a political basis, and that the Works Progress Administration there was organized for certain specific political purposes. I report on these charges in the order stated.

(1) Giving of relief or employment to persons on relief in West Virginia on a political basis.

The Senator's words are:

"If a man goes to get a job from any county, he must get a letter from the named political boss in that county. * * * In other words, it is not to give a person relief, but to put a few politicians into the administration of an act that was not meant for politicians." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 17, p. 2199.)

"I said [referring to a previous address] that they had county bosses and that a person to get on relief got the O. K. of the county boss." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 26, p. 2841.)

An examination of the records of the Works Progress Administration of West Virginia and of the National Reemployment Service in the State shows that from the beginning of the program until December 10, 1935, persons were assigned to approved projects by the National Reemployment Service on the requisition of the Works Progress Administration. The assignments were made from a relief roll theretofore established by the Relief Administration of the State of West Virginia. Of the 55,000 persons now employed on approved projects in West Virginia, approximately 40,000 were thus assigned by the National Reemployment Service. Subsequent to the 10th of December 1935, assignments have been made by the Works Progress Administration itself from a list of persons taken from the same relief rolls. This change in procedure was made with the full agreement of the Works Progress Administration and the National Reemployment Service in order to expedite the assignment because the National Reemployment Service was not sufficiently staffed to meet the rush of requisitions. This change was approved by this Administration.

The records do not disclose any political activity or bias in the assignment of relief clients to projects. Conferences held by myself and my three associates in this study with numerous officials, citizens, and relief clients demonstrated beyond question that the assignments were made in accordance with the regulations and that there was an entire absence of political consideration in the process. I file with this report documents and statements from officials of the Works Progress Administration and the National Reemployment Service which furnish irrefutable proof of the absence of political influence in assigning relief clients to work.

(2) Organizations of the Works Progress Administration for certain specified political purposes.

The Senator's words are:

"I charge Mr. McCullough with using the office he holds for nothing more than to try to carry himself to the office of Governor, not for the administration of the Work Relief Act itself." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 17, p. 2200.)

"I charge that the W. P. A. in the State of West Virginia was built for a factional political machine." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 26, p. 2843.)

"Here is what the State personnel agent, Mr. Melton Maloney, in charge of all the personnel in the State, said: 'From the very beginning my hands were tied. I was not allowed to do the job I had been drafted to do. Mr. McCullough told me on December 24 that he was powerless to do anything about it because he was being dictated to by Senator NEELY's personal organization in the State.'" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 26, p. 2842.)

The specifications given under the charges of political exploitation and domination relate to the appointment of administrative personnel by Mr. McCullough on a partisan political basis and to the appointment of supervisory personnel on projects on the same basis.

The Works Progress Administration in West Virginia is organized under a State office in the city of Charleston and six district offices in the cities of Charleston, Lewisburg, Huntington, Elkins, Fairmont, and Parkersburg.

The principal staff members in the State office are a deputy administrator and the director of five divisions. A brief account of the members of this staff, made up from an examination of their personnel records and conferences with them, is revealing.

The deputy administrator, Mr. E. C. Smith, Jr., is a graduate engineer of 27 years' experience, which includes work on the Panama Canal and a distinguished war record. He was appointed by the State administrator after approval by the chief engineer of this Administration, based on a careful examination of his professional career. He had no political endorsement.

The director of finance and statistics, Mr. B. H. Puckett, is a public accountant, certified in Ohio and West Virginia, and has practiced public accounting for 11 years. He was chosen by the regional representative of this Administration in his specialty and appointed on that recommendation alone with no political endorsement.

The director of the division of assignment, Miss Silene Gifford, a social worker of outstanding merit, was assigned to that service in West Virginia by this Administration and is on this staff. No political endorsement.

The director of the division of women's work, Mrs. Dora Garlitz, is a recognized leader in women's activities in the State, and was widely recommended, including recommendations from Senator HOLZ and Senator NEELY.

The Director of Labor Relations, Mr. H. B. Colebank, is a former member of the Marine Corps, a recognized labor leader and was endorsed by the United Mine Workers of America and the Federation of Labor of the State. He was also recommended by Senator NEELY.

The Director of Educational Projects and of the National Youth Administration, Mr. Glenn Callaghan, was appointed on the recommendation of a former president of the National Education Association, numerous educators, and also of Senators NEELY and HOLZ.

An examination of the personnel data on file in the State office concerning all the administrative employees discloses some interesting facts.

There are 583 employees whose records were reviewed; 114 of them were appointed by their superiors without recommendation from anyone else.

The file contains a record of a total of 1,701 recommendations or endorsements, 379 of which were written by public officials or by officials of the Democratic and Republican Parties.

As to 368 of the employees there were no recommendations or endorsements from public officials or party leaders. Of the entire group, from clerks to department heads, 202 had college training.

Of the 68 engineers employed, 48 were graduate engineers; of the 114 accountants employed, 90 had specialized training and 3 years or more of previous accounting experience.

Individual conferences were had by me and my associates with the 49 heads of divisions of the State and district offices, with approximately 20 of the junior administrative officers and with 39 of the area engineers who are in direct touch with the projects; in all, 108 administrative officials. All of them, except 11, were regarded as highly capable. These latter had individual weaknesses or had become demoralized by forces outside the administration.

The files were thoroughly searched. No record proof was found, letter or memorandum, relating to Mr. McCullough's supposed campaign for Governor. Only two administrative employees under careful questioning said that they had received any instructions or suggestions relating to the subject. They were Mr. Matthew S. Holt, Jr., a brother of Senator HOLZ, and Mr. Dorr Tucker, a former secretary to Senator HOLZ.

Formal statements of all heads of State and district departments and of the area engineers are attached as exhibits to this report.

The charge is made in the statements of Senator HOLZ in his addresses that project supervisors, timekeepers, and foremen were appointed only on the approval of designated political leaders in the various counties. This system, it is charged, was devised and managed by the United States attorneys for the northern and southern districts of West Virginia and by the United States collector of internal revenue in that State. Formal statements of denial from two of these officials are attached as exhibits to this report, and a verbal denial was made to me by the third. An examination of the files of these officials, with their consent, disclosed copies of letters of recommendations for jobs, but disclosed no evidence of any concert or scheme such as is charged to exist. Indeed, there was no evidence of any extensive or continued interest in appointments on the part of any one of these officials, nor of any interest except a proper one.

A bulletin issued by the State administration directed that supervisory personnel should be appointed by the engineering staff in cooperation with the Division of Labor Relations and on the approval of the district directors.

In three of the districts lists of county "advisers" on the employment of supervisory personnel were found. They contained the names of local public officials and members of political parties or factions. They were traced to three minor district employees and to the State personnel director. One of these employees admitted that he had prepared and disseminated the list and the other two denied it. The attempt to so influence appointments failed because it was effectively resisted by the area and district engineers. A study of a group of supervisory personnel taken at random from the files was made, showing the type of superintendents, foremen, and timekeepers actually selected. A memorandum on that study is attached to this report as an exhibit and discloses that these people had had long and qualifying experience for their positions.

There is no evidence that either Senator NEELY or Mr. McCullough countenanced the preparation or dissemination of these lists of "advisers" or that they even know of it except in one instance as to Mr. McCullough. In that instance a county senator, John Green, of Mingo County, one of the "advisers" made an issue with the area engineer, Mr. Butler, on the appointment of superintendents and timekeepers. Butler promptly took the issue to his superior, Mr. Blackburn, the district engineer of the Charleston district, who as promptly took it to Mr. McCullough. The record shows that Mr. McCullough stated that it was the business of the engineers to appoint supervisory personnel, and that that should be done by Mr. Butler without interference from Senator Green.

The statement above quoted of Mr. Melton Maloney, who held the position of assistant director of personnel from July 1 to December 31, 1935, and to the effect that McCullough told him that he had been discharged "because he (McCullough) was being dictated to by Senator NEELY's personnel organization in the State", is denied by Mr. McCullough. Mr. Maloney's employment ended at the time of a reduction in administrative cost ordered by this office. In a statement to me, which is filed as an exhibit to this report, Mr. Maloney said that he had told Mr. McCullough after notice of his discharge that he would do everything in his power to have McCullough discharged from his position.

The proof submitted by Senator HOLZ consists in part of alleged statements made to him by F. W. McCullough, Works Progress Administrator for West Virginia, as follows:

"Mr. McCullough has personally told me, not once but many times, that the W. P. A. would make him Governor. He thought the N. R. A. would make him Governor, but it expired before the campaign." (Senator Holt's letter of Feb. 15 addressed to you.)

"He has told me with his own mouth that the 55,000 people employed in the Works Progress Administration of West Virginia would make him Governor of the State of West Virginia." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 17, p. 2199.)

"I was asked the other day to say where Mr. McCullough told me he wanted to be Governor. I will tell Senators where he told me. He told me that in the Mayflower Hotel in the city of Washington, and he told me that in the Daniel Boone Hotel at Charleston, W. Va. He said, '55,000 men can make anybody Governor, and they know where they get their jobs.' I challenge him to deny that, and I will tell him the exact date." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 26, 1936, p. 2843.)

In Mr. McCullough's statement, which is attached to this report as an exhibit, he specifically denies having made this statement to Senator Holt at the places designated or at any other time or place. Whether the statement was made or not is a question of veracity between Senator Holt and Mr. McCullough.

Mr. McCullough, in a statement issued to the Associated Press on February 18, 1936, said:

"I am not a candidate for Governor or any political office in the State of West Virginia. I have only one concern and that is the success of the Works Progress Administration.

"Steadfastly, since my appointment as administrator last June, that has been my ambition."

On the matter of political domination the following statements of Senator Holt are of interest.

On November 8, 1935, the Senator wired Mr. McCullough concerning the Huntington district and its director:

"I have consistently requested John West to cooperate in Mason County, not only once but many times, and I have been informed by my friends that he is not doing so. As you realize, I have tried to accept conditions as they are, but, frankly, I must protest most vigorously against continuation of such practices. I hope that this matter will not have to be taken up again, and I insist that some definite understanding be made."

Another wire of the same date says:

"Will no doubt appeal to officials here about West. Have further information that he has refused to cooperate; therefore must request intervention from Washington. Sorry that Huntington situation forces me to appeal directly to Federal officials here, but it seems as though I cannot get any consideration on matter that is very urgent to me in district. Hate to do this on your account, but must protect administration."

On January 25, 1936, the Senator wired to the director of the Elkins district:

"Information has been given me that you refused to appoint O. L. Hetzel as Hardy County N. Y. A. supervisor and named L. B. McNeil at request of H. N. Calhoun. You not only went over my head but refused to requisition him. Shall take matter up with Mr. Williams here in Washington and see if such practices will be tolerated."

The reference is, of course, to Mr. Aubrey Williams, the Administrator of the National Youth Administration.

In his address to the Senate on February 26, Senator Holt said:

"Now look at my home district. I took responsibility for the Parkersburg district, my home district. But, Senators, I will not have to take it long, because I made a speech on the floor of the Senate against the W. P. A. on Monday, and on Friday my brother was fired out of it." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Feb. 26, p. 2843.)

Mr. M. S. Holt, Jr., the brother of Senator Holt, was appointed district engineer of the Parkersburg office in July 1935. According to his statement, which is attached to this report as an exhibit, he assumed control of that office to the exclusion of the district director.

The record shows that on a visit to West Virginia January 31-February 1 by Mr. Wayne Coy, field representative of this Administration, he received reports of maladministration in Parkersburg.

On February 6-7 he sent members of his staff there to investigate the reports. Their report, which reached him on February 14, showed (1) prosecution of unapproved projects, (2) overloading of projects with supervisory personnel, and (3) improper placing of administrative personnel on project pay rolls. On the same day, February 14, Mr. McCullough wired to Mr. Coy:

"Am convinced and so recommend that nothing short of a complete reorganization in the fourth (Parkersburg) district will solve our particular problems there."

So that at least 3 days before the Senator's speech, and in an effort to correct the results of bad administration in Parkersburg, Mr. McCullough had reached the decision to relieve M. S. Holt, Jr., of duty.

During the course of my investigation in the Parkersburg district I find that early in February of this year subscriptions had been solicited and taken from the employees of the Parkersburg office to pay the expenses of broadcasting a speech delivered by Senator Holt at St. Marys, W. Va., on February 7. I file with this report as exhibits the original subscription lists, the contract with the radio station, and check stubs showing the disbursement. I file also a statement from M. D. Dean, office manager and director of personnel of the Parkersburg district, describing the transaction, and stating that Senator Holt's address related "to National and West Virginia political affairs."

Senator Holt has called attention in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that W. J. Gates, an official in the Fairmont district, was chairman of the Democratic Party of his county. Gates was a relief client who had been elevated to the position of assistant supervisor of projects and planning in the Fairmont district. The matter of his connection with the Democratic Party has already been handled by the State administrator, who has advised him that he must give up one job or the other. A copy of the letter indicating that action is attached to this report as an exhibit. Attention was called by Senator Holt to the fact that Sutton Sharp was an official of the Works Progress Administration at Fairmont and was the editor of the Fairmont Times. I attach to this report as an exhibit a statement from Sharp and the newspaper which establishes the correctness of the Senator's statement. Mr. Sharp's superior and the State administrator state in writing that they did not know of this dual relationship until I called it to their attention, but obviously Mr. Sharp should relinquish one of these positions.

Senator Holt states that Abe Forsythe, the acting director of the Parkersburg district, is a representative of material dealers and is selling goods to the Works Progress Administration; and there are printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts of a letter written by Forsythe to Senator Holt in July of 1935 wherein Mr. Forsythe appears to make a bid to sell materials and supplies to the State of West Virginia on a political basis. The files show no purchases of materials by the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia from Forsythe or from any company with which he was formerly connected, and the record is clear that Forsythe severed connections with materials companies before he was employed by the State administration. A copy of the full letter from Forsythe to Senator Holt is attached to this report as an exhibit. It should be observed that from October to the middle of December, which roughly represents the formative period of the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia, Senator NEELY was on an official trip to the Orient.

II. ADMINISTRATIVE COST

Attached to this report as an exhibit is a statement taken from the books showing the cost of administration and giving certain other financial data. It discloses that administrative cost of the entire period of operation of the Works Progress Administration in West Virginia is approximately 4 percent. During the formative period, when the personnel was largely engaged in the preparation and submission of projects, it was around 6 percent. For the month of March it is 2.6 percent.

From a record of a group of projects which I examined and which had been criticized it would appear that these projects had been overloaded with supervision. The project forms of these projects show that project numbers had been assigned to certain field personnel employed in inspection without reference to the whole list of projects that they actually did inspect. In conformity with established government forms the salaries of these officials have in fact been prorated on the books against all the projects over which they had supervision.

In certain instances it was found that the salaries of office personnel had been charged to projects. This practice had already been corrected before the date of my investigation.

III. MR. McCULLOUGH'S FITNESS FOR OFFICE

The charges of Senator Holt in this respect relate largely to matters of opinion except as to Mr. McCullough's connection with what is described as a "42-percent loan stock bank" and to certain transactions in connection with the Huntington State Hospital.

On the former matter the facts are clear that Mr. McCullough was employed several years ago to promote the passage in the West Virginia Legislature of the uniform small loans act recommended by the Russell Sage Foundation and intended to provide protection against loan sharks. Until recently he was president of a bank established under that law. The usefulness of such banks is a matter of controversy, but they are approved by a large body of respectable opinion in the United States.

The copies of official records and affidavits relating to the Huntington Hospital matter filed with this report show that there was no impropriety on the part of Mr. McCullough in that matter.

IV. INCIDENTAL FINDINGS AND ACTION

In the course of my investigation of the charges of political exploitation of the Works Progress Administration and on the matter of administrative costs and the fitness of the State Administrator to hold his office, I discovered that at Christmas time subscriptions had been taken from the employees of the State office and the Fairmont and Parkersburg offices for a Christmas present for Mr. McCullough. Similar subscriptions had been taken for Christmas presents for Mr. M. S. Holt, Jr., in the Parkersburg office and also for a wedding present for him on the occasion of his recent marriage. While there were no evidences of coercion and all indications are that these subscriptions were spontaneous on the part of the employees, it represents a practice which ought not to be approved.

A number of alleged abuses on individual projects and certain alleged irregularities were called to my attention by various citizens of the State. They do not indicate a condition that affects the integrity of the Administration. I have offered them to the field representative who represents this Administration in West Virginia for administrative action or reference to the Division of Investigation as the nature of each case may warrant.

ALAN JOHNSTONE,
Field Representative.

MARCH 11, 1936.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4086) for the relief of Ellis Duke, also known as Elias Duke.

POWERS, FUNCTIONS, AND DECISIONS OF THE SUPREME COURT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR MINTON

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on the 4th day of March this year the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] delivered a very able address before the Federal Bar Association at the Mayflower Hotel in this city. I ask unanimous consent to have that address printed in the RECORD, together with the table attached to it.

There being no objection, the address and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Toastmaster, ladies, and gentlemen, I consider it a privilege to be permitted to speak to you on this occasion, and I congratulate you on your good fortune in having with you this evening the distinguished lawyer, who has the honor to be at this time president of the American Bar Association, Judge William L. Ransom. No one is better qualified to speak for the things he believes in than is Judge Ransom. The judge and I do not agree on many things, but I am sure he joins with me in the sentiment of Voltaire: "I may not agree with what you have to say, but I will fight for your right to say it."

It is difficult for one to speak at the present time on any subject relating to the Supreme Court, its powers, functions, and decisions without being misunderstood. No one can say after 150 years of our experience under our present form of government that the Constitution is obsolete or outmoded, or that constitutional government is a failure. On the contrary, and notwithstanding our partial failures, I assert that our form of government is not a failure, and I know of no one in responsible position today who thinks it is. I have heard some serious indictments of our form of government by very able men. I have heard some statements of very distinguished men that seem to me to be an indictment of our form of government, although not intended to be such by the author.

For instance, Senator BORAH, during the last session of Congress, on the floor of the Senate said: "The situation is rapidly approaching a crisis. We are apparently facing a catastrophe. It was stated a few days ago by one in position to know, that 80 percent of the human family is living below the poverty line. We have millions on relief and millions more living on a low standard, while a vast portion of the people are unable to secure what a decent standard calls for."

If, as Senator BORAH says, 80 percent of the human family is living below the poverty line, when we consider the number of unemployed and the size of the relief rolls at the peak in this country, we would be safe in saying that 40 percent of the human family in this great, rich country of ours was at one time living below the poverty line. Is not that a most serious indictment of our form of government, after 150 years of experience? So when one considers an appraisal of our form of government, his warrant for doing so is the distress of the great masses of the people suffering in the tolls of an unequal distribution of the wealth and power of the country. And so in an emergency of this kind it behooves us to see that our machinery of government is properly coordinated.

No part of our Government should be free from criticism. In my judgment, no part is. Certainly we in Congress and the President of the United States are not only criticized but abused in the strongest and vilest language that public media of communication will carry. But let one raise his voice about the Supreme Court, and the lawyers especially throw up their hands in holy horror, as if a sacrilege had been committed. The Court itself has assumed no such sanctity, and as far as I know has asked no exemption from a critical examination of their record. Indeed, one distinguished member of that Court, Mr. Justice Brewer, in a speech before the Marquette Club in Chicago, in 1898, said:

"It is a mistake to suppose that the Supreme Court is either honored or helped by being spoken of as beyond criticism. On the contrary, the life and character of its Justices should be objects of constant watchfulness by all, and its judgments subject to the freest criticism. The time is past in the history of the world when any living man or body of men can be set on a pedestal and decorated with a halo. True, many criticisms may be, like their authors, devoid of good taste, but better all sorts of criticism than no criticism at all. The moving waters are full of life and health; only in the still waters is stagnation and death."

A great deal is being said at the present time about the power of the Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. That is an academic question. For a century and a third the Court has claimed the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. True there is no specific grant of this power in the Constitution to the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. The right is implied from a number of other provisions of the Constitution. The fact that this power is not specifically granted is not very persuasive as an argument that the Court doesn't have the power, for its specific powers are not enumerated in the Constitution. However, I do not think that one who reads the debates of the Constitutional Convention and the discussions attending the adoption of the Constitution can reach any other conclusion than that if this power had been provided in the Constitution it would never have been ratified. During the Constitutional Convention an effort was made to give the Court revisory or veto power with the Executive over the acts of Congress. This was four times voted down and the veto power was given to the Executive alone.

Whether this was a manifestation on the part of the Convention of its purpose to deny the Court the power to veto the legislation of Congress, or a desire to keep the judges out of the lawmaking business and leave them free to apply the Constitution to the law in the cases that were properly brought into the Court's jurisdiction, is a debatable question. The fact remains that the Court has the power and exercises the power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional. It has an absolute veto. It is absurd to say the Court doesn't declare the acts of Congress unconstitutional, that it only has the right to render judgment as to whether an act of the Congress is the law of the case or the Constitution.

The plain truth of the matter is that the Court does declare acts of Congress unconstitutional and just as effectively nullifies them as if they were repealed. The distinction between what it is asserted the Court does and what it actually does is too fine for practical purposes. It is much like the old wheeze—that it wasn't the fall from the tenth floor that killed the fellow; it was the sudden stop.

With the right to exercise this power to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional I shall not argue. It is the American system of judicial supremacy, unique in the world of jurisprudence. Not another court in the world exercises such power. It doubtless is a good thing to have a body that has nothing to do with the initiation of legislation, to have the power to act as a check upon the legislative body. The people and the President act as a check upon Congress, and the Court is a double check upon Congress and the people; but who checks the Court? Is it to act unchecked, and by a mere majority, when no one else does?

The members of the Court are human. To that, I am sure, the Court would agree. As such human beings they are infallible and subject to all the influences of training and life work before going on the Bench—environment and the usual amount of prejudices and predilections of the average person. The question naturally arises, Is it wise to place in the hands of five of nine men that constitute the Court the absolute power to veto an act of Congress? The answer to that is—they have the power, but that power is, in my opinion, subject to regulation by Congress. The Court itself has laid down some rules for its own guidance in the review of cases. In the early case of Briscoe v. The Bank (8th Peters, 118) the Court declined to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress without a full Court; the Court said: "The practice of this Court is not (except in cases of absolute necessity) to deliver any judgments in cases where constitutional questions are involved unless four judges concur in the opinion, thus making the decision that of a majority of the whole Court."

The right, therefore, to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional by a majority of the Court is a rule of practice laid down by the Court itself. The Court, in the case just quoted from, refers to this rule as a practice of the Court. Another rule of practice laid down by the Court is that the Court will not declare an act of Congress unconstitutional unless the act is clearly unconstitutional beyond a reasonable or rational doubt.

How can it be said that the unconstitutionality of an act of Congress is clear beyond all reasonable doubt when four of the nine distinguished and eminent jurists of the bench are of the opinion that the act is constitutional? Or even three? You cannot convict anyone in a Federal court in this country of a crime until each and every one of the 12 jurors are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant. If the triers of fact are to be held to such unanimity of opinion in a field in which they are not experts, but are inexperienced, and where the conviction for the crime may carry a trivial penalty and affect only the defendant, why may not the great jurists upon the bench, who are skilled and trained in their profession, and real experts in their line, be required to exercise as much unanimity of opinion as an inexperienced juror in the box, especially since the matter submitted to the Court affects the daily life of all the people?

But the argument is made that we are a government by the majority, and the Court should be permitted to act by a majority vote. We most certainly are not a government by the majority. Ours is a government of checks and balances with more than a majority of the Congress required in numerous cases for effective action. Let us see if we are a government by the majority. This could happen. An act could pass the House by the unanimous vote of all its 435 Members, pass the Senate by a vote of all 96 Senators, be signed by the President of the United States, and upheld by the district court and the four or five judges of the circuit court of appeals, and upon submission to the Supreme Court, of a case involving the constitutionality of that act, five out of the nine men on the Court could overthrow the House, Senate, the President, the district court, and the circuit court of appeals. Of course, this is an extreme case, but it is possible. But in any case, five men in the Supreme Court can overthrow the judgment of four of their associates, their brothers of the lower courts, the President, and Congress. In every case where an act of Congress is declared unconstitutional the President and Congress are overruled. Congress itself does not always act by a majority vote. Each House may, "with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member." As you well know, the President wields the power of two-thirds of Congress in the veto he holds. He alone is as strong as two-thirds of Congress. His veto is not final, and Congress may pass the act over his veto "if approved by two-thirds of both Houses." This veto was the only veto expressly given by the Constitution. Such veto may or may not be final, and even the people may take a hand, but when the Supreme Court speaks, its voice is final for all practical purposes, and it takes a constitutional amendment to get around the Court, and on a resolution to amend the Constitution, to get around the decision of five men, two-thirds of both Houses shall approve such resolution, and then three-fourths of the States must ratify it. Thus we see that five, in a country of a hundred and twenty millions, constitute a majority, and for all practical purposes their vote is final. This is majority rule with a vengeance. On the other hand, nothing is final with Congress. Whatever is done at one session of Congress may be undone at the same or any subsequent session.

On impeachment before the Senate "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present."

The President may make treaties, which become part of the law of the land, "provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

"Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House" remove disability, incurred by participation in insurrection or rebellion.

From these provisions of the Constitution, it is quite evident that we are not a government by the majority. Since we are not a government by the majority, and it is a rule of practice only, laid down by the Court itself, that it acts on the constitutional questions by a majority vote, can Congress change a mere rule of practice and provide that before the Court shall declare an act by Congress unconstitutional more than a majority must concur?

As you know, the Constitution provides: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish."

The next section provides the cases to which the judicial power shall extend, and from these cases confers original jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court in "all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party." "In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

There is a difference, not always observed, between power and jurisdiction. Jurisdiction is the limits to power. Webster defines jurisdiction as "sphere of authority, the limits or territory within which any particular power may be exercised." Literally, it means the right to speak. Now, if the right to speak in appellate matters is given the Congress, and no one denies it, and such right to speak is "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make", and no one can deny it, then Congress may prescribe the practice in the form of a limitation upon the exercise of the power. After all, that is what jurisdiction is, the demarcation of the boundaries in which power may be exercised.

If the Court has the power to speak on the constitutionality of an act of Congress, to say that it shall speak by a certain number in such case, is simply to limit the power and define the method under which the power may be exercised and is in the nature of a regulation of the exercise of that power.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is just what Congress gives it, and is exercised under such regulations as Congress shall make. Granting the power of the Court to hold acts of Congress unconstitutional, there seems to be no doubt but what Congress may prescribe the practice in such cases by proper regulation. This does not deny the power, but provides regulations for the exercise of the power.

In Wiscart v. Dauchy (3 U. S. 321-327) Chief Justice Ellsworth, the author of the Federal Judiciary Act, speaking for the Court, said: "If Congress has provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction, and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it. The question, therefore, on the constitutional power of an appellate jurisdiction is simply whether Congress has established any rule for regulating its exercise."

Later, in the case of Duncan v. The Francis Wright (105 U. S. 381, 385), the Court, in commenting on the Wiscart case, said: "This was the beginning of the rule which has always been acted on since that, while the appellate power of this Court constitutionally extends to all cases within the judicial power of the United States, actual jurisdiction under the power is confined within such limits as Congress sees fit to prescribe. * * * Authority to limit the jurisdiction necessarily carries with it authority to limit the use of the jurisdiction. * * * The general power to regulate implies power to regulate in all things."

In American Construction Co. v. The Jacksonville Railway (148 U. S. 372), the Court says: "The Court, therefore, as it has always held, can exercise no appellate jurisdiction, except in the cases and in the manner and form defined and prescribed by Congress."

From these decisions, and many more that may be cited, and the plain language of the Constitution, it seems that the power of Congress is clear. We all know that appeal is not a matter of right, but a privilege granted by the sovereign power. Therefore, when a litigant is granted this privilege of review by the Supreme Court of the United States it is under such exceptions and regulations as Congress shall make. Congress can and should provide that when a litigant challenges an act of Congress on constitutional grounds in the United States Supreme Court, the act of Congress shall determine his right unless he is able to convince at least seven Judges of the Supreme Court that the act conflicts with the Constitution and therefore is invalid. Thus the burden is upon the appellant to establish his right under the Constitution, not by a mere majority, but by seven out of the nine Justices, and thus approach more nearly the rule of the Court, that unconstitutionality must be established beyond reasonable or rational doubt.

Such regulation by Congress is logical and consistent with the mechanics of checks and balances and the philosophy upon which our form of government is constructed. I therefore deny that ours is a government by the majority, and that the Supreme Court is only carrying out the theory of the rule of the majority. I assert that ours is a government of checks and balances, and it is unwholesome and dangerous to place in the hands of five men, however eminent, able, and patriotic, the exercise of so great power in a sphere so remote from the source of all power—the people themselves.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—ADDRESS OF HON. JAMES A. FARLEY

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley before the Charitable Irish Society at Boston, Mass., on March 17, on the subject The United States of America.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I esteem it a great honor to address your society on this its one hundred and ninety-ninth anniversary. I feel a personal pride in your organization, in its fine purposes, and its history of accomplishment running back through the years long before the birth of our Nation itself.

It must be a source of pride and satisfaction to know that down through the years some of the outstanding men in American public life have come here to join you and to praise the purposes for which you stand. Your organization has grown and spread its influence far beyond its original geographical limitations. The Charitable Irish Society is nationally known because it deserves to be nationally known.

I was interested, in reading the accounts of your splendid past, to learn that a President of the United States, William Howard Taft, was an honorary member of your organization; that great churchmen, distinguished authors, and men known everywhere for their deeds and character have come here to take rank gladly in your society.

There is a reason why this little society founded by 26 sturdy Irishmen back in the early colonial days has managed to survive and prosper despite the pressure of difficult times and changing events. I think the secret of the Charitable Irish Society lies in the fact that it has perpetuated the essence of those things in the Irish character which are universally loved and respected by all men and women regardless of race or religion. The Irishman throughout history has had a genuine sympathy for the unfortunate and the oppressed; the Irishman has always been willing to pause in the hurly-burly of life or the smoke of battle to lend a helping hand to the chap who is down and needs assistance.

We sons of Erin have had a number of complaints charged against us down through the years—and here in the bosom of our family we can admit that some may have been amply justified—but no one has ever said that we are a cold race or that we are unmoved by human suffering. We have sympathy for the sufferer because we have suffered ourselves.

And so I say what man of Irish race could stand here before you on this occasion and not express warmly to you his gratification that there is such a society and that it has lived so long? You will soon celebrate your two hundredth anniversary. God grant that you may thrive and do your good work and reflect credit on your race as long as the Republic stands.

This is an occasion on which one might be expected to tell the world about the glories of our race, about our great men of letters, our patriots and statesmen, our soldiers and captains of industry. But we all agree that we are a great people, so why repeat the obvious? In any event I'm not so sure that we are as fond of flattery as people sometimes suppose.

We like to give flattery, and in fact the Irish have raised it to such a fine art that the word "blarney" has come to have a place in the language of our country. Perhaps that is the reason why we are always a bit suspicious of flattery when it is handed to ourselves.

No; I would prefer to talk to you about the place of the Irish-American in our national life—the blessings which this land has conferred upon us, and the responsibilities, as I see them, which we have assumed as a part of the birthright of American citizenship.

Patriotism to me is enthusiasm for the public welfare and devotion to the betterment of all our citizens from the lowest even to the highest. Patriotism is not undirected emotionalism. It must have content and purpose; it must be the driving force of progress, for where there is no progress dry rot and decay quickly enter in.

We do not—cannot—stand still as the reactionaries would have us do. We move forward or we perish. That is the rule of life. And yet the reactionary often envelops himself in the cloak of patriotism and, in the name of country, demands a halt to what is in effect a march of civilization. I want none of his brand of patriotism. Nor do I want that of him, who, sympathizing little with American institutions and understanding little of American history, thinks destruction is a condition of progress. Let us have the Americanism of the best Americans, and not of the worst.

I have never been impressed by flag-waving patriots, because waving and profit too often go together. But like most men of the Irish race, my love of country has always been deep and sincere. You will understand me, therefore, when I say that there is real need today of a revival of true patriotism in this country, and to this no one can make a more effective contribution than the sons of Erin. No racial group that has come to these shores from across the seas owes more to America and appreciates America more than do we. We owe much, I say, to America. We owe so much because America is a land in which the gifts of soul and mind which God has given us find their fullest flowering. America was just made for the Irish, but not quite in the sense that that statement is sometimes uttered.

Our race has had centuries of oppression. Here we have liberty and opportunity and we deeply prize them both. Those talents which were long suppressed have their full play on these shores. We can grow and develop, and those talents of organization and leadership which are ours in a high degree can have full fruition here. We can build our homes and raise our children in a land of equals. We have a voice in public affairs; we can help shape the destiny of this great country, and that we treasure highly. For are we not at heart poets and idealists—and dreamers of dreams? Few people wish more than we do to build a better world. And here is the opportunity—the opportunity to create for America and for ourselves as part of it.

But we need frequently to dedicate ourselves to the task of helping in the true upbuilding of America. That is what I mean by the urgency of a renewal of patriotic zeal. America has done much for us; we must continue to do much for America. All our gifts must go into that task.

You will wish me to be more specific. What is our task? What is the problem? It seems to me it is the maintenance of our democracy, both economic and political, against the forces which continually seek its overthrow. Constant vigilance is the price of liberty. That is equally true of democracy, which is the essential of liberty, as liberty is the essential of democracy. And I do not mean the liberty to exploit, but the liberty of the people to direct their own affairs in the interest of all. The true meaning is often distorted. Today we are amazed to find so many people suddenly becoming "liberal" and burning with fervor for the Constitution. All the "best people" are spending sleepless nights worrying over the dissolution of our democracy, which they profess to believe is fast taking place. Is it not strange that liberty, the Constitution, and our democracy seem to be disappearing every time the Government makes a serious effort to do something for the masses of the people? Would that our friends in heavily financed propaganda organizations did indeed yearn for the liberties of the people—the liberties to live and grow and raise their families in decency and honor; did indeed burn with zeal for the Constitution properly interpreted as an instrument of progress; did indeed want passionately, as they say they do, a democracy in these United States of the sort the fathers dreamed of.

I know, of course, I will be accused of talking demagoguery. I will be accused of appealing to the masses; I will be accused of stirring up class hatred. On the contrary, I am appealing to the conscience, the honor, and the intelligence of the American people. I am appealing in particular to you of Irish blood to keep up the struggle for true liberty, to continue to offer resistance to distorted concepts of the Constitution by self-interested groups, and to continue to work for vindication of the true principles of democracy upon which alone progress can be made.

Every faith, every party, every class of our people, rich or poor, is interested in the eradication of the abuses which privilege, in its various forms, continually develops in our national life. Government must forge the instruments of correction. If it does not, it is sterile. To stand pat, to do nothing, is to fail in the responsibility which the people place in the hands of government. To assume that with the evolution of business and economic life no abuses arise, or that they are self-corrective, is absurd. Did we not have the panic of 1929 and the depression which followed it? Can anyone contend that those troubles, so costly in human values, were not due to causes which in a large measure can be removed? Will anyone contend that, even with the correction of present abuses and evils in our economic system, others will not appear? That is the way life runs. The problem of the relation of Government to business is a difficult one, but there is a relationship, and Government and business together must solve the problems involved. Moreover, there is a continuing relationship; and Government, if it is to perform its function, must be positive, constructive, and legislatively creative. It must guard against the abuses of speculation, the abuses of credit; it must, within its function, seek to bring stability and security into the economic system. It must in an emergency take measures to keep the economic machine running lest people starve. It must, as private business cannot, provide security against old age and unemployment. There is no simple formula to determine where private business ends and Government activity begins.

Surely Government does not belong where private initiative can effectively function; but if private initiative fails, then Government must step in, because the Government's first duty is to the people as a whole. Liberty is not an abstraction; it is a true living thing in the life of the people. The greatest oppression comes from adverse economic conditions. Liberty grows to the degree that such oppression is lifted.

It is my honest conviction that here in America we are experiencing at this moment a notable rebirth of the ideas and principles upon which the Republic was founded and through the application of which it has grown to greatness. I sense a growing desire in all parts of the country to surge forward until we eliminate great economic wrongs which have existed in this country for generations and in other countries perhaps for centuries. Why should sweatshops exist? Why should farmers work from sunup to sundown for less than a living wage? Why should child labor be tolerated?

The American people are demanding an answer to those pertinent questions and they are demanding a remedy for those evils. We have succeeded in eliminating a great many of the wrongs inflicted upon the great masses of people in the past and with God's help we are going forward until we eliminate the remainder.

Here in this country, after more than a century and a half of experience we have succeeded in implanting the idea of civil liberty deep into the hearts and minds of our people. We know that in the United States of America, to a degree unknown in most parts of the world, we may enjoy the inalienable blessings of freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and religious liberty, without restraint or governmental interference. Now, we must go forward until we make the reality of economic freedom equally a part of the heritage of every American boy and girl.

The ideals which I have just enumerated constitute the ultimate objective of those who are now grasping with the tremendous problems confronting our Federal Government. To win victory, we must master complex social, economic, and political forces. We are now well on the way to victory, and as we look about us at the world today, we may appreciate better our own good fortune. We can appreciate the fact that the United States, thank God, is singularly free from the social disturbances, threats of war, and economic chaos which unfortunately afflict many of the unhappy nations of Europe and the Orient. Why are we so favored? No man is able to scrutinize the divine will of Providence, but certainly the United States is losing nothing by remaining true to its own idealism.

Of late we have heard a curious and unusual kind of complaint being uttered against the men who now fill eminent positions in American public life. We hear these men criticized as visionaries, as dreamers, as idealists who are full of righteous anger against old wrongs, and full of zeal to help their fellow men. They are condemned as impractical, although it is my notion that what they have accomplished will rank with the great constructive accomplishments of history.

There is a familiar ring about this faultfinding and this criticism. Where have we heard such talk before? It is the same age-old complaint that has been made against the sons and daughters of old Ireland for centuries. You recognize its source and it is my humble belief that we have very proudly entered a plea of guilty to that charge. We are idealists and dreamers and visionaries and we will remain so until the end of time.

Remember, the accomplishments of today were the dreams of yesterday. Every splendid achievement for the uplifting of humanity and the betterment of the common lot has had its birth in the brain of some man or woman who was looked upon as a starry-eyed theorist.

A laboratory worker conceived the idea of stilling pain in surgical operations and anaesthetics were born. A telegraph operator pondered over the sparks shot off by electric wires—and the electric light was born. A philosopher thought of a state of civilization in which a man could have civil and religious freedom and the right to work out his own destiny according to his own energy and conscience—and liberty was born. I say the dreamer, who knows how to carry out his worth-while dreams, is the most valuable man we have.

Here in Massachusetts and in other parts of New England it has been a custom for many years past to give positions of trust and responsibility to men of Irish birth or extraction. It is such a commonplace that it no longer excites comment. There is hardly a State in the Union or a city of any considerable size in which we do not find men and women of Irish blood occupying positions of influence. They win recognition because they perform their duties with a sense of understanding and loyalty that wins the respect of their fellow citizens.

I wish to call your attention to the fact that, to an extent which never before existed in this country, men of Celtic blood have been called to Federal service in the great task of reconstruction now under way.

They occupy high administrative posts and they are performing their duties in a manner which has won almost universal approbation. These men are bringing honor to their country and honor to the Irish race because they are playing a magnificent part in a great task which must be done.

This is an age vibrant with the thrill of great events about to happen. We sense the fact that, both here and abroad, great forces are ready to start in motion. It is an age for Irishmen to live in because the world needs men who have vision and faith and who employ those two great virtues for constructive purposes.

The Irish have long been proud of America; it is our duty to make certain that America is proud of us.

MERCHANT MARINE—LETTER BY SILAS BLAKE AXTELL

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have a very interesting letter from Silas B. Axtell, a distinguished attorney of my city, who has represented seamen in various legal controversies. The letter is so important as bearing upon any possible maritime legislation that I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, March 18, 1936.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I quote the following from pages 213 and 214 of the report and record of the preparatory maritime meeting, Geneva, December 1935. The statement is from a speech by J. Hensen, labor delegate from England, member of the Joint Maritime Commission.

"Then we hear a good deal from British shipowners as to the cost of running their ships. Foreign competitors, Government representatives sitting here, and the outside public naturally conclude that British ships must cost more to run than those of any other country. I propose giving you the wage scales of various countries' ships as compiled in 1932 by the International Mercantile Marine Officers' Association, and for comparison take vessels of each country carrying 33 hands, which consist of a master, 3 mates, 4 engineers, 10 deckhands, 10 stokehold hands, and 5 in the catering department. The monthly figures are as follows—and this is the wage bill alone: United States of America, $889; Holland, $429; Denmark, $377; France, $367; Sweden, $336; Great Britain, $335; Germany, $338; Norway, $321; Belgium, $265; Estonia, $226; Portugal, $173; and Spain, $137. On this basis Great Britain comes seventh in the list out of 12, while Holland comes second. The figures of seamen employed in 1933 in the British mercantile marine were 147,000—I am just giving round figures now—consisting of 96,000 British, 7,000 foreign, and 42,000 lascar seamen, the latter of whom form 40 percent of the total employed but who only receive an average wage of £1 8s. per month. So that, if that low average is taken into account with the British rate, we will say, of £8 10s., Great Britain comes down very low indeed in the scale."

This might be interesting to you in connection with the passage of the proposed King bill, too. But it ought to help on the basis of passing your S. 3500 for operating subsidy. It may be that the wages of the men on British and other ships have proportionately increased somewhat since 1932. While I am heartily in favor of the extension of the equalization feature of the La Follette Seamen's Act, I can see no reason why the American shipowner, who is expected to pay higher and higher wages to American seamen—and I want him to do so—should not, in foreign trade, have made up to him the difference in some such subsidy plan as proposed in your bill S. 3500. The amount to be paid under S. 3500 will vary, of course, with voyages and trades.

The more the foreign steamship wages can be forced up, the less amount will have to be paid by the United States Government to make up the difference in operating cost to the American owner. So I feel that S. 3500, if passed, will create more economic force toward the enforcement of the equalizing features of the Seamen's Act than would happen under any other plan that I have heard of.

These views, of course, are my own, but I think they are shared by the great mass of American seamen and officers.

Very truly yours,

SILAS B. AXTELL.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11035) making appropriations for the military and non-military activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment known as section 4, appearing on page 76, after line 8, was stricken from the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President I hesitate to ask the Chair to restate the parliamentary situation, but my attention was diverted for the moment. I think the question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary situation is that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] has made a motion to reconsider the vote by which section 4, appearing on page 76 after line 8, of House bill 11035 was stricken from the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from North Dakota, if it should be agreed to, would restore lines 9 to 14, inclusive, on the last page of the bill, and place a limitation upon profits on airplanes, and so forth.

I invite the attention of Senators to the fact that this matter was not considered by the committee in the House of Representatives. The language was placed in the bill as an amendment offered on the floor of the House. It was not considered by the House committee. The only comment in the House debate on the provision is found on page 2109 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14. The amendment was offered by Mr. McFARLANE. Without any discussion, Mr. PARKS, chairman of the committee, said:

Is that the same language carried in the Navy bill every year?

Mr. McFARLANE replied:

In substance that is correct.

As a matter of fact that language is not carried in the Navy Department appropriation bill. Under the terms of the Vinson-Trammell Act there is a limitation upon profits in Navy construction. Then Mr. McFARLANE elaborated his first statement, calling attention to the fact that it was not in the Navy bill, but in the general law. It was before this that Mr. PARKS stated that as chairman of the committee he saw no objection to it.

As a matter of fact the retention of this provision would do exactly what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] said the other day it would do. If the motion of the Senator from North Dakota is agreed to, it would drive us back to the cost-plus method of construction which is extremely expensive. The provision under discussion was given full consideration in the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. Several pages of testimony relating to it will be found in the hearings. The Assistant Secretary of War and others having to do actually with these purchases appeared before the committee and argued strongly against the provision in a meeting of the subcommittee. Every member of the subcommittee was present, 11 members in all, and the amendment proposing to retain the provision was unanimously rejected. Then the matter came before the full committee, where 23 members were present, and the full committee, presided over by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], rejected the amendment. I want Senators to know this.

As the committee sees it, it would be extremely difficult to carry out such a provision. It would not save money. It would not provide any safeguards that do not now exist. It is stated in the hearings that every contract for an airplane, engine, or accessory is audited, and in no case to date has it been found that any airplane manufacturer or engine manufacturer has made anything that might be deemed an excessive profit.

Let me call attention to the fact that when a bid is submitted there must be a full-size sample airplane brought with it. If there were no chance for the competing companies to recoup at sometime the expense of constructing such sample airplanes it would probably result in no bids being submitted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. For the information of the Senate, I desire to state that the same proposal is pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the same opposition has been registered by all the officials of the Navy Department, from the Secretary of the Navy to the naval officers in charge of construction. They emphasize very strongly the necessity for repealing this provision as it applies to naval aircraft, as well as Army airplanes. They particularly emphasize the fact that it constitutes a very great disadvantage in obtaining bids for the construction of aircraft. They state that it is customary to ask for sample aircraft to be submitted before the bids are asked for, and that the manufacturers do go to great expense in building models and presenting them for inspection to the Navy Department. When such models are submitted, thereafter bids are asked upon the most desirable types. In the event this provision should continue in the law, the Government, it is alleged, would be placed, as it is now placed, under very great handicap so far as the Navy Department is concerned.

I thought it would be interesting to Senators to know that the same question is now pending before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and some action is desired along the same line by the Navy Department.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the able Senator from Massachusetts for what he has said. In the War Department the officials ask for full-sized planes as samples.

Mr. WALSH. The Navy Department does also. Of course, it involves very great expense. When the bids were asked, the manufacturers who produce naval aircraft that are acceptable usually add something in their bids to cover the expense of constructing the models.

Mr. COPELAND. In the Army and Navy Journal for February 22 the statement is made that both Representative VINSON, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, and Representative McSWAIN, chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, have indicated their opposition to this provision in the Army bill.

I hope the motion of the Senator from North Dakota will not prevail.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, when we were discussing this particular motion a few days ago I quoted from a letter from the Comptroller General, being a copy of a letter written to the Secretary of War, in which he recited the fact, in regard to recent airplane contracts entered into by the Army, that the War Department had received bids from three different airplane companies for 20 airplanes. The contract was finally awarded to the highest bidder of the three, which was the Douglass Aircraft Co. The Curtiss-Wright Co. had bid $20,000 per plane below the Douglass bid, and the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation bid a little lower than that figure. On the 20 planes at the rate of a little more than $20,000 per plane, the Army paid on that contract a little more than $400,000 above what it would have paid the low bidder.

Comptroller McCarl stated in his letter to the Secretary of War that the specifications of the low bidder exceeded those required by the Department in asking for bids. Of course, the contract was let under that clause of the law which gives the Secretary authority to accept the bid which he believes will best serve the interests of the Government. The Department gets around the law in that way. It seems to me there should be some provision to limit the profits.

I have a report from the House subcommittee of aeronautics submitted in 1934 containing the minority report by Representative McFARLANE, of Texas. He went into the matter of the contracts quite thoroughly. He showed, in reference to a number of contracts dating from 1926 to 1933, that more than 90 percent of them were let without any competitive bids. Of course, it is all well and good if that is the way a majority of the Senate want these contracts for Army and Navy purposes to be let, but I do not believe it should be the policy of the Government to allow any department to award contracts, running into millions of dollars in many instances, without any competitive bids.

The Assistant Secretary of War, in the hearing before the Senate committee, made the statement that it was their policy to invite several of the airplane companies to experiment and send in bids for supplying the material the Department wanted. That is not what we call the submission of competitive bids by any means, and it seems to me my motion to reconsider should be adopted. If that can be done, I have an amendment which is practically the same as the amendment in the Navy bill which provides for a limit of 10 percent on contracts of $10,000 or over. It is somewhat improved. It is one that Representative McFARLANE was instrumental in having drawn up. If the motion to reconsider this provision should be adopted, I should move to substitute for the provision put in the bill by the House a provision which is practically the same as the one the Navy Department has imposing a limit of 10 percent.

I have here a copy of another letter from Comptroller General McCarl. It is in regard to a contract let by the War Department for spark plugs. It is what they call a sort of experimental contract. It is for only 1,400 spark plugs. They let without competition a contract for 1,400 spark plugs, at $2.97 apiece. I am not familiar with the general cost of spark plugs for airplanes. That may not be too high; I do not know; but, at any rate, this contract was let as an experimental contract for 1,400 spark plugs, at $2.97 apiece, without competition. In my opinion, there should be a general investigation of the contracts let by both the War and Navy Departments, and some legislation should be drafted to limit these profits.

It is said that it is impossible to imagine that there is any collusion between the officials of our Government departments and the private companies that manufacture and sell these goods. It will be remembered that only a few months ago, when there was complaint made that there had been some collusion and fraud in letting air-mail contracts, a lot of those contracts were canceled. I am not so sure but that there is some collusion and graft in the airplane and other contracts which have been let in recent years.

In the minority report by Representative McFARLANE, of Texas, he gives a table showing the connection between various aviation companies and their industry. He also states in his minority report that the principal contracts for aeronautical supplies are let to about six of the big companies. He presents a little drawing showing the connection between the various airplane companies, showing that they have interlocking directorates, and that the same men are connected with two or more companies.

For instance, the Curtiss-Wright people were connected with at least eight other companies.

The Douglas Aircraft Co. people were connected with at least three other companies.

The Pan American Airways people were connected with at least six other companies.

Mr. President, this table shows that the companies are interlocked, and Representative McFARLANE calls them "one big family." In the building of ships it was brought out by the Munitions Investigating Committee that the shipbuilders apparently would get together and decide which company would take the dreadnaughts, which company would take the cruisers, and which company would take the submarines or some other kind of boat, and then they would bid, and the company that was decided upon would get the contract, because it was the one that was intended to get it. It would seem, from the investigations of the Munitions Committee, as if the men in the Navy Department knew where those contracts were going before the contracts were let.

I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in regard to that matter; but where contracts involving millions of dollars are let without any competition, it seems to me a limitation should be put in this bill. If it does not work out as we think it should work out, it may be amended; but if the provision in this bill limiting profits to 10 percent is stricken out, it is going to mean that before the present session is over we shall be asked to vote to strike out the 10-percent limitation in the Navy bill, too. I understand such an amendment is now pending before the Senate committee.

If it is the wish of the Senate to let the bars down, and let these contracts be made without competition with anyone with whom the Department wishes to make a contract, then let the 10-percent provision as to profits be stricken out. Otherwise the vote by which that amendment was adopted should be reconsidered; and I shall be glad to offer a substitute for that amendment, if the vote is reconsidered, to make the provision along the same line as the provision included in the Navy Act at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 76 was adopted.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, so far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, it has no further matters to offer.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I desire to bring up the motion which I made last Thursday to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] relating to the Florida ship canal, proposing, on page 69, to insert certain words, and to increase the appropriation from $138,677,899 to $208,677,899. I think if the Senate is going to adopt the other projects, the Florida ship canal is perfectly justified. I was not present when the amendment was acted upon, and I should like to have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I wish to make a few comments on the brief suggestion of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] made in support of the motion to reconsider. It seems to me—I am only speaking my own opinion—that there is an error in his logic.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] says that if we are to allow one of the projects to go through, we should therefore approve the others. My understanding of the position which the Senate took in its vote the other day is that it was a flat stand that the Congress of the United States should not be bound by an allocation by the President of funds for the construction of a project. In other words, the Senate took the position that the authorization of a project was a legislative act; that while the President had full and complete authority to expend upon any type of project he saw fit the relief money put in his hands, the expenditure of that money did not and does not commit the Congress to a continuation of the project. It seemed to me the purpose of the vote was to take the position that Congress had reserved to itself the right to select the projects which it would authorize.

The argument which seems to be made is that if Congress has refused to authorize one project, it must refuse to authorize all other projects; or if it has authorized one project, it must authorize the others. That to my mind is a direct repudiation of the premise upon which the Senate acted. That premise was that Congress should do the selecting. In this case Congress saw fit to say that one project was not approved, but that other projects were approved. I cannot concur in an argument which denies to Congress the right to make the selection, and which says to us, "If you say that one project does not meet the approval of the Congress, therefore you cannot approve others."

The junior Senator from Missouri, who makes the motion, was not present during the argument the other day, but the argument is made by those who favor the motion who were opposed to the Florida ship canal, that the Senate having agreed with them, had no right subsequently to approve another project.

It seems to me that the result of the view of the Senator from Missouri is that, having made a mistake in voting in favor of the three projects, the Senate should reconsider that and make a mistake upon all the projects; in other words, instead of being from that standpoint 50 percent wrong, we should complete the situation and be 100 percent wrong.

The argument which was made by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was to me unanswerable. He discussed the Florida ship canal. He said a great principle was involved—that if we should recognize the right of the Executive to make an appropriation for partial construction, to obligate the Congress to complete the project—if it were held that that constituted an authorization, we would obligate Congress, by a slight appropriation of a few thousand dollars, to great constructions running into the billions.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will agree with me that precisely the same great question and principle is involved in all five projects which was carried in the original Fletcher amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator has not changed his view, I suppose, that the principle involved in the Florida ship canal project was wrong.

Mr. CLARK. Not in the least degree, and I say it was extremely bad.

Mr. ADAMS. Then, may I ask the Senator, having decided correctly in reference to the Florida ship canal, why should a motion to reconsider as to the case where we decided correctly be made, rather than as to the case where we decided wrongly?

Mr. CLARK. Because the five projects, as I see the matter, are on the same footing. I wish again to call to the attention of the Senate exactly what they are doing when they agree to the other three projects and send the bill to conference with those projects included. Moreover, I think that, so far as the question between the two Houses is concerned, those who believe in the principle which I advocated here on last Monday against all five projects are in a better position to win in the long run with all five projects included, than with two of them out.

Mr. ADAMS. I was such a thorough convert to the views of the Senator from Missouri that I voted with him against the Florida ship canal, and I voted with him on the point of order, though his position was in conflict with the practices of the Committee on Appropriations, because I felt he was suggesting a sound fiscal policy as to matters of legislation. So I followed the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator was entirely right in that, of course; but he did not follow me far enough. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. The only thing I am amazed at is that the Senator, having been correct, should support a motion to reconsider a vote when he was correct, rather than to seek to reconsider the vote of the Senate which he feels was incorrect.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield on that point, I should gladly have made the motion to reconsider on the three projects adopted if I had been permitted under the rules of the Senate to do so. On the vote to which the Senator refers, namely, for the three smaller projects, and which I agree was incorrect, I voted correctly, and therefore was not eligible, under the rules of the Senate, to make the motion; otherwise I would have done so.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator did not make the motion, but perhaps he persuaded his colleague, who was not here, to make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. TRUMAN. I have always been very much interested in the Florida ship canal, and I would have made the motion to reconsider under any circumstances.

Mr. ADAMS. I would go a step further; while I voted for the three projects, I would have been very glad to have made a motion to reconsider as to the other project, so that the Senate might have had a chance to hear the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Why did not the Senator do so? He was eligible to do that. Just why he should wait for someone else to do it is a reflection on the Senator's ability to represent his State, which I know to be an incorrect reflection, because he is one of the ablest Members of this body. If the Senator thought a motion ought to have been made, he was the man to make it.

Mr. ADAMS. I did not think it ought to have been made, but would have been willing to afford the Senator the opportunity to seek to correct that which he thought was wrong.

One other word in regard to this: It seems to me that the very foundation of the position which the Congress must take is that we grant to the President the right to expend these great funds as he judges, within the limitations of the act, and he having started the Florida ship canal, and having started three other projects, he cannot and does not deny to the Senate the right to approve one and disapprove the others. In other words, I am not willing that the President, by making an allocation, shall be regarded as having made a legal authorization, nor am I willing to go to the other extent and say that I will vote against every project to which the President makes an allocation, if I think, as I do, that in this group of minor projects are some which should be approved, I exercise my judgment about them; that is, the question is as to the right of Congress to select those projects for which it will make appropriations.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the controversy which arose in regard to the point of order which I made did not question in the least degree the right of Congress or the propriety of Congress adopting any project it might see fit to adopt, either after it had been initiated by the President or before. The debate which took place, and the whole theory of the point of order, went to the effect that the initiation of a project by the President and the making of an estimate for a project did not constitute such an authorization as would make it in order on an appropriation bill under the Senate rules.

The general principle involved in the matter of the five projects and the whole question is whether the initiation of a project by the President under his blanket authority in the $4,800,000,000 act or the $3,300,000,000 act was such an authorization of law as would justify the Director of the Budget in making an estimate; not the question whether Congress had a right in substantive legislation to adopt a project or make it eligible for further appropriation, but the question of whether it was eligible for an appropriation in this body as a direct proposition coming from the Committee on Appropriations. The Senate by the two votes proceeded to make fish of one and fowl of the other, although they were on precisely the same footing—apparently on the theory that the three projects which were finally adopted were small projects, chicken feed, although each one of them involved the expenditure of several million dollars, in comparison with the two huge projects, the Florida canal project and the Passamaquoddy project.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the Senator argues the premise upon which I had agreed with him, but the Senate, having decided against the view of the Senator from Missouri, says to us that an estimate from the Bureau of the Budget is sufficient to authorize the Senate to include in an appropriation bill these items of appropriation. The Senator and I were in the minority upon that question, but I assume that, the Senate having decided the matter, from that point on we discussed the matter upon the theory of parliamentary procedure laid down by the Senate. Consequently, the Senate having said that the Florida ship canal amendment could be offered and that the amendment covering the Conchas Reservoir and the Bluestone Reservoir could be offered, it was then up to the Senate to decide whether or not it would approve these individual projects. In other words, the question as to whether there was a legal authorization had disappeared out of the argument. The estimate of the Bureau of the Budget, under the ruling of the Senate, had come to constitute a legal authorization for an appropriation by the Senate.

In my own judgment I felt that the Florida ship canal could not be approved. I felt that a canal, the absolute and entire cost of which was to be borne by the United States, which would take 10 years to complete, was wholly beyond the scope of any project to relieve unemployment. I was opposed to it because I thought it to be economically unsound. It is proposed that we spend $200,000,000, though the estimates of the engineers drop to as low as $143,000,000. My experience with engineers' estimates, however, leads me to make very expansive allowances beyond them.

If the canal shall be constructed the benefits will go only to the shipping which uses it. It is proposed that there shall be no tolls charged; that it shall be a free canal. The shipping companies say, "If there shall be a charge of as much as 8 cents or even 5 cents a ton, we will then not use the canal." Its economic advantage is so slight, even to the shipping companies, that unless the canal is a free canal it will not be used.

It seems to me the Government, in view of its present financial burdens, ought not to spend $200,000,000 and then assume the burden of a yearly cost of maintenance and interest payments which I think will run between $7,000,000 and $10,000,000. I think those from the State of Florida who favor the canal would be gravely disappointed in the results to their State. I think they would find simply a great gash across their State.

As I have looked hurriedly into the effect of the construction of other ship canals, I have failed to find that through traffic tends to build up the country through which it goes. I know that the building of highways does not result in building up communities which border upon the highways at which those using the highways do not stop. The same thing would be true of the Florida ship canal. The ships would go through it; but Florida, in my judgment would derive little, if any, benefit from the passage of the ships through the canal, regardless of how many ships might go through.

So, Mr. President, we are planning to spend a vast sum of money upon a project initiated as a relief project which would not economically justify the charging of any tolls. Some of the other projects would be completed—and I have better knowledge concerning the project in New Mexico—in probably another year, within the period of need for relief work. In connection with some of the other projects there will be a financial return from power or through assessment on lands benefited. There would be no return, however, upon the money spent in constructing the Florida canal. It runs beyond the need of relief work; it seems to me to be unjustified, and, to my mind, there is a distinction between the projects.

I say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that if I was wrong in either vote, I was wrong when I voted for the three small projects, and I was not wrong when I voted against the Florida ship canal. Therefore, I do not think the motion to reconsider the part of the vote which in my judgment was unquestionably correct should be sustained.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words. I do not wish to prolong the debate, but merely to correct some of the assumptions made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS].

The Senator made some reference to the merits of the Florida ship canal. We went into that question the other day, and I shall not review it. The board of review, composed of P. W. A. engineers and Army engineers for rivers and harbors, estimate the benefit to commerce arising out of the canal at $7,500,000 annually. That estimate results from considering it as a river and harbor project, but does not take in some collateral factors, such as national defense, avoidance of natural hazards, and other items which might be considered.

The Senator says shipping companies will not use the canal. He says they so state. That is an all-embracing statement. The fact is, only a few shipping companies have made statements to that effect in some communications; but the same writers on other occasions have taken the contrary view, and have so stated. Only a comparatively few shipping companies have said they would not use the canal. Not all the shipping companies have made such a statement, as could be implied from the remarks of the Senator. This matter was discussed on the 17th of March.

The Senator from Colorado speaks as if all the shipping companies will not use the canal at all. That is not the case. Only a few shipping companies have written letters to that effect, and they contradict themselves in other letters. The board of review, established by the President, estimated and recommended to the President that if the construction of the canal cost $160,000,000 the expenditure of that amount would be justified. The cost is now fixed at $143,000,000, and nobody knows as much about the project as the engineers of the War Department, the engineers of the P. W. A., and the board of review, which combined all the reports and all the data up to the time the recommendation was made. They made their report to the President recommending that the canal be constructed at a cost of $160,000,000. The cost was finally set at $143,000,000. No one has any right to name any other figure.

I shall not go into all the details in connection with the canal; but, I will say, as bearing upon the question of its economic justification, that the engineers say it will create benefits to commerce of $7,500,000 a year.

On the subject of approving the other three projects and not approving the Florida ship-canal project, and the right of the Congress to do so, I will only say, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has well said, that the Atlantic-Gulf Ship Canal stands upon identically the same footing as the other three projects so far as their authorization is concerned.

The authorization of the other three projects, which have been agreed to by the Senate, was the same authorization by reason of which the work was begun on the Florida ship canal, and the same recommendation to Congress was made by the same authority. If the other projects were authorized, the Florida ship-canal project was authorized. There is no escape from that conclusion. The only difference is in the amendments involved.

Mr. President, I decline to think that the Senate will tolerate discrimination and unfairness such as would obtain if the Florida ship-canal project were rejected and the other three projects allowed to continue. The other projects stand upon the same footing as the Florida ship-canal project. If they were authorized, the Florida ship-canal project has been authorized and is authorized under the law. Concerning that I have no question whatever in my mind.

My amendment would add the Atlantic-Gulf Ship Canal to the three projects the Senate has approved, and would add $12,000,000 to the appropriation as recommended by the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers, and included in the Budget estimate. The President has submitted all these projects to Congress with his recommendation. These projects were authorized in the same way and stand on the same basis. They were all legally authorized; all were surveyed by the Army engineers; and all are meritorious, and should be treated alike.

Mr. President, I ask that a letter bearing upon this subject which I have recently received from the Port and Waterway Survey of New York City be read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

PORT AND WATERWAY SURVEY,
New York City, March 18, 1936.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This office followed very closely your effort to secure an appropriation for the continuance of the work on the Florida ship canal.

During the World War the railroads were unable to carry the transportation burdens of the country and it was then generally conceded that as a matter of national safety, the construction of strategic inland waterways should be undertaken. France continued the construction of the Marseille canal system during the World War and more recently England has enlarged its inland canal system, and Belgium has extended its system.

May we suggest, therefore, that the construction of the Florida ship canal be again submitted to the Senate, possibly as a part of the burden of providing adequate national defenses?

Very truly yours,

PORT AND WATERWAY SURVEY,
By J. J. O'BRIEN.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement concerning the Florida ship canal and also an editorial from the Tropical Sun of West Palm Beach, Fla., of the issue of March 20, 1936, under the heading Bad for Florida.

There being no objection, the statement and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ATLANTIC-GULF WATERWAY

President Roosevelt allocated $5,400,000 to begin construction of the project, which has been spent or obligated to be spent. The work is under direct supervision of engineers of the War Department and has progressed in a most satisfactory manner. The Chief of Engineers, War Department, recommended to the Director of the Budget that $12,000,000 be provided for continuing work during the fiscal year 1937. The Director approved that recommendation and submitted it to the President, who also approved and included it in the War Department Budget transmitted by him to Congress.

Therefore, after consideration of all matters involved, the Chief of Engineers, the Director of the Budget and the President approved and recommended that Congress appropriate $12,000,000 to continue the work.

Opposition to this project comes mainly from persons who are misinformed regarding conditions that exist and benefits that would accrue to the Nation and the State of Florida. Thousands of dollars have been expended by selfish interests, who appear determined to prevent completion of the waterway, irrespective of the benefits that would accrue to them, directly and indirectly.

[From the Tropical Sun, West Palm Beach, Fla., Mar. 20, 1936]

BAD FOR FLORIDA

Last Wednesday was a bad day for Florida.

The defeat of the cross-State canal appropriation means, among others—

That the South is still the stepchild of the Republic in distribution of funds for internal improvements;

That we lose the current benefits to flow from expenditure of $150,000,000 of public money within the confines of this State;
That we lose the international advertising of the State and its resources which would have necessarily resulted from continuation of the canal work;

That thousands of our fellow citizens who would have found work and wages on the canal will again go hungry and jobless;

That the profits which contractors and materialmen would have reaped from canal contracts will not accrue. * * *

But for their drivel as to canal damage to the State's fresh-water supply by infiltration of salt into our surface and underground water supplies we have and express the utmost contempt.

The facts disprove any such possible damage because—

First. For uncounted thousands of years surplus fresh water from south Florida has been borne into the Atlantic Ocean at Jacksonville by the St. Johns River, some 300 miles from its source.

Second. The tides have carried salt water from the ocean inland as far as Palatka, on the St. Johns, and up other rivers and harbors of the State for unknown ages, without affecting the fresh water at Jacksonville or other adjacent points.

Third. Ocean and Gulf have surrounded Florida ever since it became a peninsula, and Tampa, Miami, and all other centers have had no trouble in obtaining ample fresh-water supplies.

We believe that construction of this cross-State canal would save millions and millions of dollars in freight and transportation charges, to and from Florida, and all other Southern and South-eastern States; and see no reason why the strategic importance of this canal, from a commercial standpoint, should not, comparably, be as great for Florida as the Erie Canal for New York State.

Let the canal issue be kept alive.

Finally, why should good Democrats furnish opponents of the administration with the slogan, "Florida canal folly", which will inevitably follow abandonment of the enterprise?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the merits of this problem again unless the vote shall be reconsidered. I totally disagree with the philosophy presented a few moments ago by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and I think I can demonstrate clearly that there is utterly no relationship between the three projects which were approved and the projects which were rejected.

As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has indicated, the Senate has the right to maintain unto itself its right of selection as between projects which are utterly unwarranted and projects which may have some semblance of economic justification.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator contend that the three projects which have been approved stand upon a different footing as to their inception and their organization?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President, I do not; but I reject utterly the proposition that simply because the Senate erred in respect to these three projects, it is bound to err in respect to the Florida ship canal. I reject the absurd philosophy that two wrongs make a right.

As I have just said to the Senate, I do not care to take its time upon the subject unless there shall be a reconsideration. Therefore, I take my seat, and suggest that the roll be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and relating to the Florida ship canal was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that before the vote is taken there ought to be a quorum called, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

So the Senate refused to reconsider the vote by which Mr. FLETCHER's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. On page 14 of the bill, under the heading "Travel of the Army", there is an item with regard to "travel allowances and travel in kind, as authorized by law." There is provision here for mileage. I wish to ask the Senator what is the present allowance for mileage for officers of the Army or Navy, when they travel by train under the law?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am frank to say I cannot answer the Senator's question. I do not know.

Mr. FRAZIER. As I recall from the information I have, just after the World War, the railroad rates were raised from 3 to 3.6 cents per mile, and the mileage allowance to Army and Navy officers was increased from 7 to 8 cents per mile. That allowance still remains at 8 cents per mile. Army officers can either take the mileage allowance of 8 cents per mile in lieu of actual expenses, or they can buy a ticket and pay their regular expenses and put in the bill for them; but where they travel long distances, I am informed they usually take the mileage allowance which gives them a little more money for expenses. I have been wondering whether the committee has given any consideration to the matter. Railroad rates are being reduced and, under authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission, at least according to newspaper reports, will ordinarily be less than 3 cents a mile.

Mr. COPELAND. Mileage for the travel of officers is a subject which has received the attention of the War Department. There are fewer transfers now, particularly the long-distance transfers to which the Senator refers. I think it is perfectly safe to assume, in view of the general attitude of the Department regarding long-distance travel, that the Government is fully protected as to this particular item. I may add that I shall call the attention of the War Department to what the Senator has said.

Mr. FRAZIER. There is also a provision whereby contracts for the transportation of troops are considered between representatives of the Army or the Navy and representatives of the railroad companies. According to the information which has come to me, such contracts are so made as to divide the transportation of troops among the various railroads. I am told the departments take regular fares instead of round-trip fares where they make the round trips oftentimes, and also take regular fares instead of excursion rates or reduced rates of any kind.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator that last year we gave consideration to this subject. It was brought out that, in the transportation of large numbers of troops, a car or a train is provided so as to get the very low rates for which the Senator is contending. Subsistence is then arranged for through the efforts and activities of the troops themselves; that is, the same as if they were in the field or in camp. The commissary goes with the troops in order that there may be certainty that there shall not be a large expense involved for subsistence of the troops en route. I think that is very carefully considered by the Departments.

Mr. FRAZIER. On page 26 of the pending bill is an appropriation for horses, draft and pack animals. I have talked with Army officers who have indicated to me that in their opinion horses for the Cavalry and for general purposes in the Army, under the present methods of warfare, are practically useless. It would seem to me that instead of enlarging the appropriation for cavalry purposes it should be reduced. With automobiles, trucks, tanks, and airplanes there is very little use for horses or cavalry in up-to-date, modern warfare.

Mr. COPELAND. The committee had thought to do something for the farmers in relation to this matter and, therefore, provision is made not for an inordinate number of horses and mules but for that number really needed and really necessary for transportation in certain lines where motorization has not as yet been adopted. I thought we were doing something in the interest of agriculture in this matter, many of the horses being bred upon farms.

Mr. FRAZIER. I appreciate the Senator's interest in the farmers.

Mr. COPELAND. That is a never-failing interest, as I am sure the Senator realizes.

Mr. FRAZIER. I fully appreciate the Senator's interest in the farmer. In the appropriation, on page 26, is included $72,155 for the encouragement of breeding of riding horses suitable to the Army. I take it that means polo ponies.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is wrong about that. I am sure he would not wish to have the officers of the Army travel on mules. With the increasing use of automobile transportation, there has been a discouragement to the breeding of fine animals suited for this particular purpose. I am quite sure I state the truth when I say this item is not for polo ponies.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am satisfied the breeding of this better grade of horses is for polo ponies. Of course, some of the horses are intended for officers' use. There is a provision likewise to encourage officers to own their own mounts. An officer buys a horse and then, to encourage him to continue to own his horse, I understand he is given a bonus of $150 a year for owning his own horse, and the Government pays for the feed and keep and care of the horse while he owns it. That is all right, but it costs the Government considerable money that might be saved in these hard times, when the money is needed for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is speaking about the subsistence of horses. If an officer is willing or can be induced or is inclined to buy his own horse, thereby saving the Government the necessity of investing money to buy the horse, it certainly seems to me subsistence should be furnished, because if the officer did not do this, a horse would have to be provided by the Government, and the subsistence provided as well.

Mr. FRAZIER. As I understand, it involves not only subsistence but $150 a year bonus for owning the horse. That is the amount paid the Army officer for owning his own horse, as I understand.

Mr. COPELAND. I would not be content to have the Record show such a bonus is paid. I am sure the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. FRAZIER. There are several provisions in the bill carrying appropriations which it seems to me should have been reduced, but I realize it is impossible to have that done. I desire to submit a few remarks on the bill in general.

This appropriation bill for the War Department carries over $1,000,000 a day for the coming year. That is only for War Department purposes and does not include the river and harbor items contained in the bill. It is one of the largest appropriations we have ever made in peacetimes for the War Department. A still larger appropriation bill is on the way for the Navy Department. It means we are going to spend for the coming year practically $1,000,000,000 for our war system.

We talk a great deal about world peace and disarmament and that kind of thing, but we continue to appropriate for our war system more money than other nations appropriate for theirs or than we have ever done in peacetimes.

I have here an article by Lloyd George which was published in the Washington Herald of March 1 of this year. It is entitled "Europe Is Girding for War Suicide. Armaments Costs Doubled in 10 Years; Pacts Ignored." In the United States we have doubled our war costs in the last 5 years, and I think if we should go back 10 years it would be much more than that.

Of course, as Lloyd George said, pacts are ignored in Europe. They are not only ignored there, but they are ignored elsewhere. In fact, the United States was responsible for the adoption of the Kellogg Peace Pact by all the great nations of the world, and yet we were the first to increase our appropriations for our Army and our Navy after having entered into the Kellogg Peace Pact, which is supposed to provide for world peace and not for war, for the settlement of disputes by peaceful methods instead of by the war method.

The English statesman to whom I have referred goes on to tell about the conditions existing in the European countries, and that they are preparing for larger armies and larger navies, which means war. I am satisfied that no other conclusion may be drawn from the fact that we are raising a larger Army and Navy and larger air forces, but that it means preparation for war. Lloyd George says it means "girding for war suicide"; and he goes on to show how, under present conditions, with the present scientific methods, a war would mean practically annihilation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have part of this article by Lloyd George printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

[From the Washington Herald of Mar. 1, 1936]

LOYD GEORGE VIEWS ARMS RACE—EUROPE IS GIRDING FOR WAR SUICIDE—ARMAMENTS COSTS DOUBLED IN 10 YEARS; PACTS IGNORED
(By David Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain during the World War)

LONDON, February 29.—The nations of Europe are today feverishly engaged in preparing themselves for the final suicide of war. They are piling up new armaments and seeking out new alliances in readiness for that insensate carnage toward which they are heading.

No calm reasoning, no sane reflection, seems able to deflect them from the path of death. Those who urge speed on the fatal journey are patriots. Those who plead for a halt to deliberate and confer are hopeless cranks.

Ever since the last stupendous world struggle there have been underground fears of another, more destructive, conflict. Fear of war has been whispered incessantly as the years slipped along. But of late the whispers have loudened out into an open clamor.

In every chancellery statesmen sit with whitened faces and irresolute hands, staring hopelessly at the menace of the calamity, seemingly unable to muster the courage and vision of statesmanship to smash the web of strangling suspicion and mutual distrust woven on every international path.

KNOW OF PERILS

They must know the impending perils, but instead of taking the only action that could avert them they are now busily engaged in increasing those perils and adding to their terrors by amassing cannons, tanks, bombing airplanes, and poison gas against the day of reckoning and by seeking to build up hasty alliances based not on mutual trust but common dreads.

Capt. Anthony Eden, British Foreign Secretary, a young minister who has climbed to the most conspicuous position in the British Government by ascending jauntily, rung by rung, on the ladder of the covenant of peace, made a gigantic program of British rearmament the practical objective of his indecisive utterance in the House of Commons last Monday.

I find it difficult to rivet attention on the growing pace at which the nations are rushing toward war.

WAR FUNDS DOUBLED

Ten years have passed since the treaties of Locarno were signed. They were intended to open a new road to universal disarmament. During those 10 years the expenditure of the world on armaments has roughly doubled. This year it will be well on the way to trebling.

In 1928 the Kellogg Peace Pact was adopted by every civilized or semicivilized country, and thereby they pledged themselves to abandon war as an instrument of national policy.

TIMIDITY BLAMED

Since then the armament expenditure has gone up at a much more accelerated momentum. The road to the hell of war is often paved with good intentions.

The Locarno and Kellogg Pacts, instruments which were regarded as milestones on the way to peace, are now paving stones on that track that leads to war.

The timidity and insincerity of the covenantor is largely responsible for this calamitous change in the attitude of mankind. All states which are members of the League of Nations are thereby pledged instantly to come to the assistance of any fellow member that is the victim of aggression.

But failure of them all even to lift a finger when China was attacked by Japan and the futility of their belated, hesitant, and trivial sanctions when Abyssinia was attacked by Italy have left the world with scant faith in the present-day efficacy of the League Covenant to guarantee peace.

As a consequence, the governments are casting around openly and secretly for allies who can be bound by common fear to help them against specific enemies. That is why the danger is so imminent.

AGGRAVATES ALARM

Every such alliance is aimed in fact, if not in open statement, against some suspected enemy and thus aggravates international alarm and ill-will and increases the very jeopardy it is meant to avert.

The recent treaty of conservative France and communist Russia is a startling symptom of the growing despair. When a republican France after the humiliating defeat of 1870 was cowering before victorious Germany she sought for protection under the wing of what was then the greatest and most ruthless autocracy of the world—Czarist Russia.

History is repeating itself in a sinister fashion in France. It is a nation of peasants who own their own land and hoard their savings—nest eggs tucked away in some discreet hiding place or secretly invested in rentes.

The French are a frugal race of small capitalists with a profound respect for property—the last people likely to be swept away by the doctrines of communism.

SLIP TOWARD DISASTER

Yet the statesmen of these countries are slipping helplessly and inevitably down the slope which will land their people in grim, final disaster.

Is there intelligence enough among our statesmen to get them to come together around a conference table where they could be frank and open with each other about the grievances, anxieties, and purposes which they desire to satisfy?

All these troubles could be cleared away without bloodshed. Certainly bloodshed cannot be guaranteed to solve them.

Instead, Europe, Asia, and America are all manufacturing more and more of the arms of wholesale human slaughter.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I have here a statement from a former Army officer, who for some time was stationed in the Philippines, Gen. William C. Rivers, retired. One of the headlines is:

General Rivers says Philippine Army, no matter how large, could not defend islands. Also scouts idea that Japan would be anxious to seize Philippines.

General Rivers was stationed in the Philippines for a number of years, and it seems to me his article is well worth considering. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

[From the Philippine Free Press of Feb. 1, 1936]

FORMER CONSTABULARY CHIEF BERATES DEFENSE PROGRAM—GENERAL RIVERS SAYS PHILIPPINE ARMY, NO MATTER HOW LARGE, COULD NOT DEFEND ISLANDS—ALSO SCOUTS IDEA THAT JAPAN WOULD BE ANXIOUS TO SEIZE PHILIPPINES

That the Philippines cannot be defended by the Philippine Army now being built, no matter how large it may be made, is the opinion of Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, retired United States Army officer and former chief of the Philippine Constabulary, who now lives in New York.

In a letter to the editor of the Free Press, General Rivers claims that the defense problem of the Philippines is "primarily a naval matter." He goes on to say, however, that there need be no fear of Japan, as the Nippon Empire would never be willing to divide its fleet in order to protect the Philippines, which it would have to do if it took over the islands. In general, he takes an optimistic view of the Philippine future. In his letter, General Rivers says:

DARK PREDICTIONS

"For some months I have enjoyed reading your brilliant paper through the courtesy of a Filipino friend. It gives to the distant reader a vivid picture of the life, improvements, and progress in the islands. The accounts in American newspapers, cabled by the correspondents who were visiting Manila, gave on the whole a gloomy view of the inauguration of the Commonwealth. There seem to have been festivities enough, but the predictions of our visiting correspondents for the future were dark. These accounts came to a climax for us here with the very general assertions that the Japanese Empire would destroy the Republic of the Philippines at the end of the 10-year interim and the fantastic proposal of Roy W. Howard to make another Cuba out of the Philippines. For that is just what the Howard plan would result in. Any plan to annex the Philippines as an integral part of the American Union will hardly meet the approval of the Congress here in the United States. It would simply mean that the United States would be, single-handed, responsible for the immunity of the Philippines.

A NAVAL MATTER

"There is a disposition here, among educated Filipinos and among the wide circle of American friends of the Philippines, to poke a good deal of fun at your elaborate and costly defense preparations. To many a relatively large army of conscripts in the Philippines brings to mind what we are familiar with in the republics to the south of us. Here it seems such an anomaly to most people that the new government at Manila put the plans for defense (wholly secured for 10 years by America) ahead of economic preparations. Annexation of the Philippines will but prolong 'Philippines' uncertainty.' Many here were surprised that there arose no voice of a Filipino Patrick Henry when the Roy Howard plan was unfurled to the oriental breezes.

"A hostile power could send to the Philippines a dozen old warships 10 or more years from now. These would simply anchor in the dozen principal ports, interrupt all shipping of mails and goods, and sit tight until the no matter how large Philippine Army came in to surrender. In other words, defense of the islands is primarily a naval matter.

"There is not a scintilla of evidence that the Empire of Japan will fail to respect the independence of the Republic of the Philippines. The airplane has again brought the Russians to the verge of the northern borders of Japan. The warfare and turmoil in China for a full generation have caused immense loss and suffering in China, and it is dangerous to Japan—so near her borders. Japan is busy aiding the Chinese to put a stop to this and to improve conditions among the Chinese. The Japanese are not likely to take on responsibilities in the Philippines that will cause their own fleet to be permanently divided. Security of the Philippine Republic can be arranged only by the neutralization of the islands. Japan and the half dozen other great countries with interests in the Orient would, I predict, welcome so sensible a plan.

"The tone of the dispatches from Manila about the number of Japanese subjects in the Philippines was on a high key. No correspondent seemed to mention that there were at last accounts only 20,078 Japanese in the whole archipelago and that in the last 4 years of the available record the number decreased by 1,438."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the statement is frequently made that our Army, even with the increase which is authorized under this appropriation bill—I mean, authorized by making larger appropriations to provide for more men—is not, at that, very large for a country such as we have; but, of course, the standing Army is not by any means the only war force we have. I have here a statement by Mr. Villard, the editor of the Nation. This article was published in the Atlantic Monthly for February of this year. He sets forth, among other things, the number of men that are included in our war forces at the present time, or, as he says, as nearly up to date as he could get the figures:

Regular Army, officers and men, 177,600.

Navy, officers and men, 103,000.

National Guard, 190,000.

Coast Guard, 10,500.

West Point and Annapolis cadets, 4,400.

Making a total of 485,500 men.

Besides that, there are the Reserve officers, numbering 20,000.

Citizens' training camps, 30,000.

School and college students, approximately 150,000.

Navy Reserves, estimated by the Navy Department at 9,900.

A total of 209,900 in these additional Army forces, which makes a grand total of 695,400 men.

Mr. Villard goes on to say:

Thus, we have a grand total of 695,400 in uniform during the present fiscal year. These figures are obviously unprecedented in our history, and to many will recall, in these days of Fascist dictatorships, the warnings of George Washington and other founders of the Republic, as to the dangers of a large standing army.

Mr. President, the framers of our Constitution and the leaders in the early history of our Nation immediately after the Revolutionary War were very strong in their statements against a large standing army, and many times went on record against it. We now have the largest standing Army we have ever had in peacetimes, the largest Navy, and the National Guard, and these Reserve officers and others that may be included in the Army and the Navy, making a total of 695,400.

A day or two ago I quoted from a statement made in a speech by the present Secretary of War, Mr. Dern, before he became Secretary of War, in which he said that he hoped the argument that preparation for war or making large appropriations for Army and Navy would keep us out of war was discredited by the fact that at the beginning of the World War the nations which were the best prepared were the ones that got into war first. I have quoted several times from Hon. William Jennings Bryan in a speech which he made after the World War started, but before the United States got into it, in which he stated that never again should men who were familiar with history, and who were honest in their viewpoints and statements, say that war preparations would keep us out of war or that appropriations for a larger Army and Navy would keep us out of war. I believe both of those men were correct in their statements. A larger Army and Navy, and these great preparations for war, mean war. They mean preparation for war and not for defense.

Mr. President, in my opinion, no one can logically argue for or defend the proposition that we are appropriating this immense amount of money, amounting to a million dollars a day, for the Army, and more than that for the Navy, for the purpose of defense. These appropriations are for the purpose of war, and it seems to me that fact cannot be denied.

If we are going to set the example to other great nations of larger appropriations for war purposes, and ignore the Kellogg Peace Pact, all well and good; but it seems to me that the voters in general are opposed to this immense expenditure in peacetimes, when we so badly need the money for other purposes. I believe they are opposed to the expenditure of a billion dollars and over, during the coming year, for Army and Navy purposes, or for the so-called war system.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that out through the territory from which I come immense appropriations of this kind cannot be defended by anyone; and I am sure that if this proposal to make these large expenditures and increases for Army and Navy purposes were put to a vote in the Middle West, it would be overwhelmingly voted down.

I realize that there is a world of propaganda for this bill; that the Army crowd and the Navy crowd, including the retired officers, are lobbying all the time for further increases of Army and Navy; and that under present conditions it is impossible to defeat a measure carrying these immense appropriations. I simply wish to call attention, through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to the fact that, in my opinion, this immense appropriation—the largest we have ever had in peacetimes—means that we are preparing for war.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote on the item on line 9, page 66, for the purpose of adding $2,000 to it. It has to do with cemeterial expenses. I presume the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] will not object to that, because it has to do with the inspection of the tombstones of the dead.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator why that increase is needed.

Mr. COPELAND. The matter was overlooked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted will be reconsidered.

Mr. COPELAND. I move that the figures be changed by the addition of $2,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to; and, without objection, the amendment, as amended, is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, during the consideration of the pending bill there have been but a limited number of Senators upon the floor except when the amendment to construct a Florida canal was under discussion. Appropriation bills carrying a hundred million dollars provoke but little discussion and arouse but slight opposition. We have become so accustomed to speak of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in connection with governmental expenditures that bills carrying such stupendous sums encounter but little, if any, opposition when brought up for consideration. Measures providing hundreds of millions of dollars for military purposes encounter less resistance than almost any other appropriation bill, no matter the magnitude of the same.

A majority of the American people are opposed to the huge appropriations that Congress has been making for a number of years for the Army and for the Navy. That does not mean that the people of this Republic are pacifists, as that word is so often used, and with the connotation attributed to it. They are a virile people and are ready and willing to make any and every sacrifice demanded by their country. When the American people believed that their rights and the rights of their country were being assailed by Germany, they, with a unanimity almost unparalleled, supported the declaration of war and the requirements for men and money in the prosecution of the conflict to a successful conclusion, but the overwhelming majority of the American people accept the ideals of the Christian faith and seek to incorporate in their lives those teachings and principles which make for economic, moral, and spiritual progress. They are devoted to the policies of peace, and I believe that this Republic should take the lead in promoting world peace. In my opinion they look with profound regret upon militarism or imperialistic adventures or the inauguration of movements calculated to disturb friendly relations among the nations. But perhaps the American people are not different from those found in other lands.

I believe history justifies the statement that most of the wars of the world have been caused by the ambition or madness of a limited number of individuals, greed, jealousy, and lust for power. These ignoble qualities manifested in the lives of a limited number of individuals have driven peoples who wanted peace into sanguinary conflicts. Most of the peoples of the world today are praying for peace and are opposed to the military burdens which are laid upon them and the formulation and execution of policies dangerous to the peace of the world.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his address before the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, said that—

The blame for the danger to world peace lies not in the world population but in the political leaders of that population.

He further said that—

Through all the centuries and down to the world conflict of 1914-18 wars were made by governments. Woodrow Wilson challenged that necessity. That challenge made the people who create and who change governments think. They wondered with Woodrow Wilson whether the people themselves could not some day prevent governments from making war. It is but an extension of the challenge of Woodrow Wilson for us to propose in this newer generation that from now on wars by governments shall be changed to peace by peoples.

Mr. President, Woodrow Wilson, in referring to Germany's part in the World War, differentiated between the militaristic cabal that dominated the state and the German people, and in his efforts to secure peace appealed to the people as against the militaristic machine that dominated the state. He labored to create an international tribunal to which appeals might be made to prevent international conflicts and to settle controversies that might arise between states.

The failure of adherence to the views of Woodrow Wilson contributed to the disturbed condition of the world and added to the military burdens which have been placed upon the people. The contention that big armies and big navies make for peace is refuted over and over again, and the situation in the world today is a further refutation of the false philosophy which has prevailed among many peoples with respect to the necessity of military policies and powerful armies and navies. As I have indicated, military armaments which burden the world today are tragic proof of this false philosophy, and constitute compelling arguments in favor of affirmative and positive movements for peace, and should compel an aggressive campaign to ameliorate the fierce and narrow spirit of nationalism. The peoples of the world have a broader horizon than many of the political leaders, and certainly than the preachers of militarism in various parts of the world.

Our Nation is in a position to lead the world. Its impregnable position, its resources, its material strength—to say nothing of what I hope is its spiritual and moral power—should give to it a crown of leadership in a world movement to organize all peoples for peace. There is an obligation resting upon the United States, in view of the important part which it has played in negotiating the Kellogg-Briand Pact to give to it a vitality and binding force among all signatories to the same. That great instrument demands disarmament and the abandonment of nationalistic ambitions which are calculated to disturb international relations. Certainly adherence to the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the support of the League of Nations by members of that world organization would tend to the promotion of peace and the prevention of international conflicts. We have spoken much about the "good neighbor" policy.

That means that our Nation is not an isolationist. This Republic, as I have indicated, is not imperialistic. It has no designs upon any country. It desires that the lanes of the ocean shall be open for the ships of trade and commerce of all lands and that the avenues of truth, of education, science, art, and literature may be freely traversed by the peoples of all lands. This Republic should take the lead in the promotion of disarmament, fearing no foe whatever and carrying high the standard of international fellowship and world peace.

Unfortunately in this, as in some other countries, there are individuals who are strong advocates of stupendous appropriations for military and naval purposes. They follow the teachings of Admiral Mahan and find weapons for their attacks in the teachings of some of the great German and French militarists whose dissertations upon war and the steps necessary to win victories are regarded as unchallengeable orthodoxy.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] referred to propaganda from which our country is not free. There is evidence, as he indicated, of no little efforts by those in military and naval positions to impress upon the American people what they claim as the imperative necessity for a larger Army and for a more powerful Navy.

There are some who question the propriety of military and naval officers devoting any part of their time in traversing the country for the purpose of delivering speeches or addresses in behalf of larger appropriations for the Army and for the Navy.

Mr. President, we are now considering the bill which carries more than $600,000,000. The bill as reported to the Senate carries an amount of $603,230,000, and there has been added to the measure a considerable sum.

Mr. COPELAND. There has been an addition of about $8,000,000.

Mr. KING. This amount should be added to the $603,000,000 just mentioned.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. This is due to the addition of the items covering engineering projects in Wisconsin, New Mexico, and Mississippi.

Mr. KING. The bill as it passed the House carried $545,226,318. The Senate committee added $58,004,000, so that the amount reported to the Senate aggregates more than $603,000,000. The regular estimates for 1937 are $572,699,305. I might add that the amount of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, total $422,896,770. It will be observed that the appropriations carried in the pending bill exceed the appropriations for the fiscal year 1936 by more than $180,000,000.

Mr. President, I find no justification for these increases; indeed, with the increasing demands made upon the Government for relief and for other governmental purposes the appropriations for the coming fiscal year should be materially less than those for the fiscal year 1936.

I stated a moment ago that the geographical position occupied by this Republic gives to it a strength that renders it impregnable to any attack. Concede the importance of military preparations and military expenditures, the basis for expenditures in other countries is wholly different from those applicable to the United States. The broad Pacific is a protection from any possible attack from oriental powers, and the Atlantic Ocean is an effective guard against any possible invasion from European countries.

There are those who indulge in hysterical statements and attempt to frighten the American people into the belief that our country lacks protection and that our shores invite invasion. These clamorous cries are without merit and call for condemnation.

The United States is not situated as is France or Belgium, or France, or Great Britain. If it be conceded that confused and belligerent conditions are to continue for an indefinite period, the reasons for military expenditures by many other countries, including those just mentioned, do not exist in behalf of the United States. We occasionally hear the statement made that we must protect against any possible assault by Japan. Mr. President, even the suggestion of Japan attempting to invade the United States is, to put it mildly, absurd. Japan's Navy, if joined by all the navies of the world, would be unable to successfully attack the United States. Japan's Navy could not and would not under any possible conditions cross the Pacific to attack the shores of the United States. It needs no naval or military knowledge to combat the statement of a possible Japanese invasion.

What European country is our foe? It is true that we were engaged in a conflict with Germany and Austria. That was a mad adventure upon the part of the Central Powers, and it demonstrated the futility of any European country waging war upon the United States. But Germany seeks no quarrel with the United States. The European nations, one and all, desire the friendship of the United States and recognize the primacy of this Republic, whether in war or in peace. Great Britain and the United States are the exponents of democratic principles; they possess similar political and governmental concepts; they desire the spread of democratic principles and a world united for peace.

Our neighbor, Canada, has the spirit of a good neighbor and the people of Canada and the people of the United States are bound together in more than friendly relations. Mexico and the Central and South American states are our friends. Even the most belligerent militarist suggests no possible conflict between the United States and any or all of the countries of the Western Hemisphere.

So, Mr. President, the demands for stupendous appropriations for a great Army or Navy do not rest upon any substantial grounds. I confess that in the rather confused condition of the world today the United States must maintain a Navy adequate for its defense.

There will be differences of opinion as to the size of such Navy. I have stated upon a number of occasions that our Navy is the equal of any navy in the world. I know that view is challenged by some, but Mr. Hector Bywater, an eminent naval writer, expressed the view a few years ago that our battle fleet of 18 capital ships is the only completely oil-burner fleet in the world, and this gives it an immense advantage over all others in cruising radius and strategic homogeneity. He further added that our battle fleet was the only one of which every pre-Jutland unit has been or is being extensively reconstructed or modernized to embody war experience. He further added that our fleet mounted 192 heavy turret guns as against 166 corresponding guns mounted in the British fleet.

It was not my purpose in taking the floor for a few moments to discuss the comparative size of the battle fleets of the world, or the number of men under arms in the various countries of the world. My purpose rather was and is to emphasize the fact that this Republic is so situated geographically, strategically, and otherwise as to be invulnerable to attack. I desire to emphasize the fact that among the nations of the world we have no enemy. No nation is building fleets or maintaining armies for the purpose of assailing the United States. All nations desire our friendship. Every nation would be glad to have the United States assume leadership in the promotion of world disarmament and world peace. I am repeating what I have before indicated when I state that the enormous appropriations which we will make this year for military and naval purposes may have a disquieting effect and find repercussions in other countries.

I inquire, Why should the United States expend from one hundred to two hundred million dollars per annum more than any other nation of the world, as we have been doing for a number of years last past? This course has resulted in expressed fears upon the part of other nations. Representatives of Japan have exhibited concern over the enormous sums appropriated by Congress for military purposes. Reference was made in the Japanese legislative assembly to the military expenditures of the United States and questions asked as to the purpose of the same, and these inquiries have been followed by demands that Japan increase its military budget in order to be prepared against any menacing movement upon the part of the United States. It reminds me of the statement of Sir Phillip Kerr, one of the great men of England, who recently stated:

Armaments inevitably produce war. They may give security, but only at the price of war. Armaments, of course, are justified on the ground that they are merely legitimate instruments of national security. But no nation can make itself secure by armaments except by having armaments which will give it victory in the event of war, i. e., by making its neighbors insecure. Hence the perpetual repetition throughout history of competition in armaments ending in periodic war.

Mr. President, the more money that we expend for military and naval purposes the larger will be the expenditures in other countries. When the United States indicated its purpose to carry into execution the naval program of 1915-16, Japanese officials were aroused, and expressed the fear that our Government entertained a hostile purpose against the Japanese Empire. Thereupon plans were prepared for the building of a number of battleships and battle cruisers in order to meet any hostile naval movement upon the part of the United States.

Mr. President, I am opposing the bill under consideration, though I know any opposition will be futile. I am submitting these rather discursive observations because I do not want the view to obtain that the large appropriation carried by this bill met with no opposition in the Senate. Perhaps only a dozen votes will be registered against it, but so far as I am concerned, I desire it to be known that there are some Senators who are not in harmony with a policy that will call for a billion, two or three hundred million dollars for the Army and the Navy for the next fiscal year.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] referred to an article by Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard. This article is an able discussion of the military appropriations for the past fiscal year as well as for the next fiscal year.

Mr. Villard points to the fact that in 1915, when the World War was in progress, there were only 4,701 officers and 101,195 soldiers in the armies of the United States. Now there are more than two and one-half times as many officers. So far as the number of officers is concerned, there has been an increase of 261 percent in 20 years. The number of officers in our standing Army are practically at the maximum figure in the history of the United States, not excepting the World War years, and today we have more officers in the Army than there were officers and soldiers in all the military forces during the entire peace years from 1789 to 1861. My understanding is that today there are 165,000 enlisted men in the Army, but the bill before us increases the number. In the National Guard there are 184,593 officers and men, or a 100-percent increase during the past quarter of a century.

In 1934 there were 13,309 officers and 171,284 men in the National Guard, as contrasted with 8,792 officers and 119,251 men in 1914. Since the federalization of the Guard, Federal payment for each drill attended by members of the Guard, and huge additional appropriations for the State troops, has undoubtedly increased their military efficiency. Since the World War there has been a reserve of officers and men such as never existed before in our entire history. In 1913 as stated by Mr. Villard, there were eight soldiers in the Reserve organization. In 1933 there were 132,773 Reserve officers and 5,028 Reserve enlisted men or 11,000 more Reserve officers than enlisted Regulars. As shown by Mr. Villard, we have three forces—Regulars, Reserves, and National Guard—which totaled 482,000 in 1935.

Mr. Villard states that the total number of Regular and National Guard soldiers, Coast Guard, sailors, and West Point and Annapolis cadets in service during this fiscal year amount to 485,000, and that the number of Reserve officers, citizens' training camps, school and college students, Naval Reserves total 209,000, making a grand total of 695,400 in uniform during the present fiscal year.

In my opinion, there is a lack of economy and a vast amount of overlapping in our military activities. I shall not present the figures in connection with naval appropriations. There will soon be a bill before the Senate carrying hundreds of millions of dollars for the naval expenses for the next fiscal year. We shall have an opportunity then to examine the various items of appropriation and to make such criticism as the facts warrant.

There are persons familiar with Army expenditures who contend if proper economies were observed and duplication avoided, many millions of dollars would be saved to the taxpayers of our country. Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, in an article in the Saturday Evening Post, has recently declared that our national-defense system "could and should be four times as effective for the money we spend."

Mr. Villard has referred to the article in Fortune which presents a study of the Army situation, and declares that the Army has no less than 67 generals to 165,000 men, whereas Henry Ford has 9 to 125,000 men. It is contended that our Army is proportionately the most heavily over-officered Army of first rank in the world.

Mr. President, a number of years ago I gave some thought to the problem of the unification of our military and naval organizations, and later, in 1925, I offered a bill in the Senate to establish a department of national defense. I reached the conclusion, from the study which I made, that there was unnecessary duplication in the military and naval activities of the Government, and that by unifying all arms of national defense, efficiency could be promoted and tens of millions, if not hundreds of millions, of dollars would be saved annually to the Government and to the taxpayers.

Briefly, the bill which I offered created an executive department to be known as the department of national defense, which was to be under the control and direction of a secretary of defense, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The bill provided for the appointment of three assistant secretaries, to be known respectively as the assistant secretary for the Army, the assistant secretary for the Navy, and the assistant secretary for the Air Force. These three assistant secretaries were under the control of the secretary of defense, and all of their work and activities were to be coordinated and integrated in order that the national defense might be brought into one rounded-out national organization.

It seemed to me that with the development in aviation there should be an assistant secretary of aviation, who, under the direction of the secretary for national defense, would carry out such policies as would make the aviation organization suitable for, and commensurate with, the military needs of the Government.

The officers of the Army and Navy objected, as I had anticipated, and yet in my opinion the opposition was not valid, and should not have defeated a policy that would have proved advantageous from a military point of view. I might say in passing that the failure to have a unified organization was tragically revealed in the disaster at Gallipoli. There was no proper cooperation between the Army and the Navy and aviation forces. I might refer to many other examples where a unified system would have brought victory where defeat resulted.

The importance of unified command was demonstrated in the allied forces in the World War. When the situation of the allied forces was dark, if not desperate, they were compelled to place General Foch in charge of all military activities which were being carried on by the Allied Powers. The experience of the United States in Cuba during the Spanish-American War brought satisfactory evidence of the value of unified military forces.

President Harding gave attention to the coordination of various activities and departments of government and appointed a commission for the consideration of this important matter. One of the first recommendations which the President made is found in a report submitted to the Senate in February 1923 by the chairman of the Commission. The report states—

(a) Outline of the reorganization plan recommended by the President and the Cabinet.

(b) Summary of recommendations.

The outstanding recommendations are as follows:

The coordination of the Military and Naval Establishments under a single Cabinet officer as the department of national defense.

Mr. President, when this Commission was functioning I gave some attention to its work, and particularly to the suggestion that a department of national defense be created which would have control over the Army and the Navy and all of the activities connected with aviation.

Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, a retired officer in the Army, has recently strongly recommended the unification of our military and naval activities. I understand that Gen. Robert L. Bullard, one of the heroes of the World War and a military student of renown, advocates a single department of national defense. My information is that Russia, Italy, Germany, France, and Turkey have combined their military and naval forces into one single department of national defense. Quite recently the British Premier, Stanley Baldwin, stated in a speech in the British Parliament that there would be unification of all military and naval activities under a single minister of defense.

Mr. President, before adjournment there will be other measures before us calling for hundreds of millions of dollars for military and naval purposes. When these measures are under consideration I may take the opportunity of elaborating some of the views which I have so imperfectly expressed. I can only say that I think we are not serving the cause of world peace or the best interests of our country when we are supporting policies that will call for more than a billion two hundred million dollars for the next fiscal year, and perhaps increasing amounts annually for an indefinite period.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator believe that these enormous appropriations and these tremendous increases in appropriations for military and naval purposes in the United States can only be taken as preparation for another war, and give the lie to every profession that has been made by the American people and the American Government in behalf of disarmament and peace?

Mr. KING. I think the statement of the Senator from Missouri is correct. Such action will be regarded as evidence of insincerity. We will lay ourselves open to the charge of being hypocritical in view of the professions we have made, and the unsatisfactory contribution made to world peace and fellowship. The United States took the lead in securing the assent of 63 other nations to the Kellogg-Briand Pact, under which war as a national policy was renounced and the pledge given that all disputes would be settled by pacific means.

Yet, in the face of those loud affirmations for peace and good will, we are spending more than any other nation in the world for military purposes.

Mr. President, the time has come, it seems to me, when the American people, those who love peace and justice, who want the United States to become a great world factor for an enduring civilization, should evince their opposition to these enormous appropriations which are being made by the Congress.

We shall soon have before us bills carrying hundreds of millions of dollars—indeed, several billions of dollars—and I believe that before final adjournment the Congress will appropriate or authorize to be appropriated a sum in excess of that appropriated by any nation in the world except during the World War. I believe the authorized appropriations before Congress adjourns will reach the stupendous sum of more than $10,000,000,000.

Congress is now engaged in drafting a bill to take from the pockets of the people over $1,000,000,000 in order to meet these lavish expenditures which will be made by this Congress. This will be known as one of the greatest spending Congresses in the history of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] a letter from Lt. Col. J. W. Anderson, of the United States Military Academy, West Point, together with a newspaper clipping. The letter and the newspaper clipping have to do with the extension of the grounds at West Point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and newspaper clipping are as follows:

HEADQUARTERS, UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
West Point, N. Y., March 13, 1936.

Col. ADNA CHAFFEE,

Office Deputy Chief of Staff, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL: I am sending you the enclosed clipping from a New York paper merely as a news item of some interest to us which has, if true, an indirect bearing upon the procurement of additional land for West Point.

The route of the proposed road does not run through property which is of great importance to us, though it is included in our third priority. However, this news item is indicative of the fact which we all knew, that land values throughout this section will increase from year to year as such improvements as that noted herein increase the accessibility of this wonderful recreational terrain to the vast population of New York's metropolitan area.

Certain it is that the longer we delay procurement of an adequate watershed and drill area for West Point the more difficult such procurement will be and the more dearly shall we pay for it.

Sincerely,

J. W. ANDERSON,
Lieutenant Colonel, Field Artillery.

PLAN TO SHIFT HUDSON RIVER ROAD SPURS HIGHLANDS REALTY BUYING—ROUTE ALONG INDIAN TRAIL TO BE SWUNG ATOP PEAKS SURROUNDING WEST POINT, CUTTING OFF 12 MILES OF TRAVEL AND RELIEVING THE TRAFFIC CONGESTION

A vast new area of virgin country in the picturesque Hudson River highlands will be opened up for development with homes as a result of the plan of the State public-works department to relocate the course of route 9W, which now follows closely the west bank of the Hudson River.

The old highway, originally an Indian trail and later a military road, is to be swung up on the top of the mountains surrounding West Point, giving the traveler as a result a much more extensive view of the "Rhineland of America", as these highlands are called, and at the same time will clip 12 miles off the road distance between the west end of Bear Mountain Bridge and the old village of Cornwall on the Hudson just north of Uncle Sam's military school. In other words, West Point and old Storm King, that rugged old heritage of the glacial age, are to be pinched out of the route of heavy traffic under the plan of Frederick S. Greene, superintendent, department of public works.

The new boulevard, a six-lane highway, will be from 1 to 3 miles back of the present route whose tortuous contours and the fact that it hugs the river has not aided in the development of this section whose natural architecture marks one of the most beautiful areas in the country.

SYNDICATES BUYING LAND

Although the State department of public works has gone quietly about this undertaking, not attempting to hide its purpose or exploit what it was doing, real-estate interests have appraised the value of the project and, according to stories which have trickled out of the fastnesses of these highlands, there has been extensive buying of lands in the area which this highway will serve. Large syndicates have been active. Whether or not they have secured all the property which reports say has changed hands is not known.

The State department, however, has acquired a strip 4 miles long through Cragston, the old estate of the late J. Pierpont Morgan at Highland Falls, now the property of the Hudson Highlands Country Club. It is to be used as a right-of-way for the new boulevard.

It is from a half to 1 mile west of the present highway. A right-of-way through the rear section of the West Point Military Reservation will carry the highway to the proposed Storm King cut-off planned along the west top of the mountain, sweeping down in long graceful contours into the old village of Cornwall.

A section close to 2 miles, beginning at the entrance to the Bear Mountain Bridge, is now under construction. The project has been designed by James S. Bixby, district engineer for the State highway department, with headquarters in Poughkeepsie. The relief of the road condition in the highlands has been a 25-year-old program. Hope to change the situation by improvements along the present highway was abandoned because of the physical obstacles.

MORGAN CAME IN 1867

It was the suggestion of Mr. Bixby that since that was the case, relocate the road, send it over the top of the mountains virtually in a straight line behind the Military Academy, Crows Nest, Storm King, and Butter Hill.

Real-estate interests believe that long before construction of the new route 9W has been completed the ownership of many old holdings along the new route of travel will have changed hands, and house builders will be active in erecting more houses than have ever covered this entire territory.

The Hudson River highlands have been the land of large estates. The character of the country and the fact that roads into this picturesque section were few allowed the assemblage of vast holdings.

Mr. Morgan began the assemblage of Cragston Manor back in 1867. He owned thousands of acres extending from the river far back into the country. The names of the Pells, the Satterlees, the Fishes, the Stillmans, the Rhinelanders, and the Osborns are associated with property ownership on both sides of the Hudson River in the Highland country.

Several attempts have been made in the last few years to launch small-house developments in the highlands, but they did not succeed because of the lack of adequate arteries of travel into the territory. The construction of the new highway, it is believed, will change the picture.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have been greatly touched by the eloquent and earnest words of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I wish to say that I take second place to no one in my desire to promote peace. This statement may seem inconsistent with the ardor which I have used in attempting to pass this bill.

I should not wish to have any misunderstanding exist as to what this bill means. As a matter of fact, so far as certain military activities are concerned, we reduced the amount of the bill as it came from the House. We did, however, increase it in this respect:

Last year the Congress, after thorough consideration of the question, decided that the minimum standing Army which this great country should have was 165,000 enlisted men and a proportionate number of officers. This number was then stated to be far below what the General Staff thought we should have. General MacArthur pleaded that the number we should have in our standing Army was 280,000 enlisted men and a proportionate number of officers. This year the Chief of Staff and The Assistant Secretary of War made the same declaration—that in order to have a skeleton of an Army, not a great fighting force but a skeletonized Army, there should be 280,000 men, and a corresponding number of officers, for purely training purposes.

We found that this bill, when it came from the House, had reduced the minimum number from 165,000 men and a corresponding number of officers, as determined last year in a bill which passed the Congress and was signed by the President. It seemed to the committee, and it has seemed to the Senate, that we should take 165,000 men as the minimum number in our standing Army.

Mr. President, this number does not provide a fighting force. What could this country do with 165,000 men? As I recall, we trained about 5,000,000 men in the last war. We had 10,000,000 men under call. If this bill shall be enacted into law and carried into effect, we shall have only 165,000 men—not a fighting force; not a force which would be of any account whatever in an offensive war, but a force which would have to do merely with the defense of our country.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If it is necessary for the United States to spend on armaments vastly more than any other nation in the world, and we still have an inadequate naval force and an inadequate military force, how much does the Senator think it would be necessary for the United States to spend to have an adequate military and naval force?

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean adequate from my standpoint?

Mr. CLARK. Adequate from any standpoint or standard Congress may set up.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator means adequate from the standpoint of military establishments, I should say we should have to have now, according to the testimony given us, at least 280,000 enlisted men.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator consider 280,000 men an adequate fighting force? In other words, if we are going into the military business, we have an Army that is vastly too small. If we are not going into the military business, it seems to me we are spending vastly too much on our Army and Navy.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think I am in sympathy with what the Senator has in mind. An Army of 165,000 men at best is a skeleton Army. It simply maintains organizations which are at their very minimum. It does not provide for a number which anybody would consider adequate in case of war.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not wish to annoy the Senator; but, if he will permit one further question, What is the increase in the appropriation carried in this bill as compared to the amount carried in the military appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me I will give him those figures, because I had it in mind to give them; but I will give them to him now. The appropriations in this bill exceed the appropriations for the fiscal year 1936 by $180,000,000.

Mr. CLARK. May I ask the Senator, then, what has taken place in our affairs since the appropriation bill of last year to justify this enormous increase of $180,000,000?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will content his soul in peace for a moment or two, I shall attempt to explain the matter as I understand it.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. COPELAND. This amount of money does seem enormous; but first I wish to justify the position of the Senate. Then I shall attempt to reply to the suggested criticism of the Senator from Missouri.

The amount carried by this bill as we now have it ready for passage is about $64,000,000 in excess of the amount carried by the bill as it came from the House. Immediately the casual observer of figures might say, "Then the Senate is more military minded to the extent of $64,000,000." But, Mr. President, of this $64,000,000, $15,000,000 is involved in the increase of appropriations necessary by reason of our deliberate intention to fix the minimum number of soldiers at 165,000. Then we deduct from that the seven or eight millions having to do with military activities which we cut off from the House bill. Then we add to the bill $58,000,000, for what? Not for arms and armament; not for the maintenance of an Army; not to develop a military force; not to provide for war. The $58,000,000 which we have added to the bill had to do with engineering problems of the Board of Army Engineers; it had to do with the improvement of the rivers and harbors of our country, not for the floating and use of naval ships but for the use of our merchant marine, or a merchant marine, or the merchant marine.

This bill as it came from the House had in it $50,000,000 for engineering projects. We have not yet passed the flood-control bill. At the time we studied this bill there had been no terrible object lessons such as we have had during the past week—lessons which, if properly applied, mean that this country must do far more than it ever before has done to control the rivers and the floods and to preserve the lives and property of the American people.

But we saw fit to add $50,000,000 to the engineering feature of the bill. We did it for several reasons. In the first place, we are hearing much about unemployment. Twenty-four millions of our people are on relief. Think of it! Almost a quarter of the people of the United States are on relief! In order to make jobs for many of these, we have done what is called "boondoggling." Is that the name? We have made work.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to my friend from New York that I am not sufficiently familiar with the practice to be an authority on the pronunciation of the word. The Senator will have to ask one of those who have been proponents of the practice.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the Senator who is now speaking could not answer, because I have not favored those expenditures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. COPELAND. The Chair wishes also to be included in the group. [Laughter.] Are there others who will join? At any rate, Mr. President, some of us who have had to do with making this bill have not favored boondoggling. We have thought that if we must spend millions of the taxpayers' money we should do it in building public works which have a permanent value. So the committee saw fit to add $50,000,000 to engineering projects. Then we came into the Senate; and, with the able Senator from Missouri assisting, $8,000,000 was added to the bill for three projects, in West Virginia, Mississippi, and Arizona.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not mean to suggest that I was assisting in adding the $8,000,000; does he?

Mr. COPELAND. I thought I heard the Senator this morning approving the reconsideration of a $20,000,000 item.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from New York certainly did hear the Senator from Missouri approving the reconsideration, which was for the purpose of trying to cut out the $8,000,000 which was put in the other day over my vote and over my protest.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I am in the fullest accord with the position the Senator took the other day; but, somehow or other, today, when we reconsidered the $20,000,000 item, we took out only $12,000,000 and left $8,000,000 in. Does the Senator realize that?

Mr. CLARK. That was the purpose of my support of the proposal to reconsider the whole matter, because I wished to take out the $8,000,000 which I thought had been erroneously put in in the first place; and I should be glad now of an opportunity to vote to take out all the other pork that was originally put in by the Appropriations Committee and not included in the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that when the Senator speaks of "pork" he is referring to the four or five projects which are in the disputed items of the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I understood the Senator just a moment ago to say that the committee itself had added $50,000,000 to these engineering projects.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but the committee did not add any "pork." I desire to be very definite about that.

Mr. CLARK. Well, that may be a matter of definition.

Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, let me say that I have great sympathy with his announced opinion that as far as may be, in dealing with unemployment, public funds should be spent on work of construction that will be of some benefit to the country. But it is very difficult for me to believe that the unemployment situation in this country or the relief situation in this country can be handled by the adding of projects to a military appropriation bill. The way to handle the matter is by substantive legislation, appropriations specifically directed to carry out those projects, and not by the Committee on Appropriations reaching down into the barrel and taking out a few projects and including them in an appropriation bill.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we do not seem to hesitate in Congress to add items to any bill. So long as we get more money, we put the projects wherever we can.

So far as the items in the pending bill are concerned, outside of those which we adopted contrary to the rules of the Senate, as the Senator from Missouri and I believe, we have projects which have been submitted, first, to the Army Engineers, and approved by the Army Engineers; which received the approval of the two committees of the Congress having jurisdiction; which were brought to the respective Houses of Congress and passed here, and were approved by the President; so those are projects which, in theory, at least, are meritorious, beneficial, and proper.

Mr. President, I have explained that, considering the amount for military activities, pure and simple, which we have taken out of the bill, and the amount which we have added to make the standing Army 165,000; and the amounts for engineering projects, totaling $58,000,000, those three items, two of addition and one of subtraction, account for every penny added by the Senate. In short, I think the Senate may say that its skirts are clear so far as any effort is concerned to promote or encourage war.

I doubt whether a dozen votes could be found in the Congress to favor an offensive war. So far as my voice may carry, I want it to be proclaimed to the world that we covet no country's possessions, there is nothing outside of our boundaries we want and nothing outside of our boundaries that we will seek to get. This is not a bill in any sense intended to promote or encourage war; it is a bill which relates wholly to our domestic concerns, it has to do merely with our home affairs; and no country in the world, I do not care whether it is European or Asiatic, can point to the pending bill and say that the United States of America has embarked upon a program of war or that there is any intent upon the part of the Congress to have the country engage in war.

Mr. President, I was much interested in what the Senator from Utah said along a line I am not discussing. He spoke about the attitude of the country toward military appropriations. Not one witness appeared before our committee to protest against the general Military Establishment. The protests made before our committee related to the National Guard and largely to the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. It is a remarkable thing that there was no protest or an allegation of militarism on the part of our country, there was no protest against militarism in the main parts of the bill. The protest was against the citizen soldier and the possibility that we were developing in youth the incentive to war, the desire for war.

Mr. President, as I said before—and I want to repeat it, because it has to do with the argument—I have a son, who, during his 4 years in college, was a member of the R. O. T. C.

He became a major, second in command in the university. He went to Plattsburg. He has been out of the university for 5 years now, and in my contacts with him, and through him, with many of his companions, I can say that I have yet to find one young man who, because of his experience in the R. O. T. C., became imbued with the idea of militarism. On the contrary, those men who have had the advantages of the R. O. T. C. have been developed along lines which are useful in peace, making for good citizenship, making for patriotism, making for the desire to see that youth shall have an opportunity to develop, not along military lines but along commercial and industrial lines, along social lines, along those lines which have to do with the welfare of youth and the future welfare and development of our country.

Mr. President, the Senator from Utah spoke about consolidations in the military service. I do not know whether he is right or wrong about that. He may be right; I have no dispute with him about it. But when he came to the matter of aviation he used the same arguments in favor of consolidating the military, the naval, and the commercial departments of aviation under a unified control.

Mr. President, I could not agree to that. I am perfectly willing that aviation, so far as the Army and Navy are concerned, having to do with the military uses of airplanes and airships, shall be under one control, but there is a great commercial use for airplanes, and the problems of commercial aviation are entirely different from the problems of the military uses of aviation. So I could not agree with the Senator regarding that matter.

I do wish to give emphasis to the thought, in closing, that so far as I know, no member of the subcommittee and no member of the full Committee on Appropriations, and I think I may go beyond that and say, so far as I know, no Member of the Senate, is in favor of war, or aggression, or interference with the happiness and contentment of other countries. We are here to take care of our own, to mind our own business, and to proceed in our own way. We are content to have every other country in the world do as it pleases regarding its military activities. So long as other countries do not interfere with us, they may go so far as they please with their own. But we are a country pledged to peace and devoted to peace, and, as I see it, there is not one thing in the pending bill which any candid student of it, any informed person, can criticize, because certainly it is not a bill which makes for war. We believe it is a bill which makes for peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FRAZIER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Chavez	Keyes	Norris
Austin	Clark	King	Overton
Bachman	Connally	La Follette	Pittman
Bailey	Copeland	Lewis	Pope
Barbour	Couzens	Logan	Robinson
Barkley	Davis	Loneragan	Russell

Burke	Gore	Minton	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Moore	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hatch	Murphy	Van Nuys
Capper	Hayden	Murray	Wheeler
Caraway	Johnson	Neely	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lewis in the chair). At this point the Presiding Officer wishes to make the same announcement with regard to absences of Senators as he made upon a previous roll call.

Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I asked for a quorum call because there were only a few Senators on the floor—perhaps only a dozen at the time—and I do not like to see an appropriation bill carrying over $600,000,000 passed by so small a representation of the Senate as was on the floor at the time.

Personally I should like to see a record vote on this measure. It seems to me the appropriation is from 25 to 50 percent higher than is necessary. I ask for the yeas and nays, and I hope other Senators will join me in making the request.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], in charge of the bill, has any objection to a record vote. For my part, I shall be glad to have a record vote. Let the roll be called.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I am advised that if present he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BULKLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], who is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote for the passage of the bill, and, as I intend to vote the same way, I am therefore free to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote. If he were present and voting, he would vote "yea."

I also wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON], who is paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay" on this question, and the junior Senator from New York, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. BARKLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted notwithstanding I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. If present, I understand he would vote as I have voted, and therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. BILBO. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], and therefore withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). The Chair wishes to announce that his colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] are detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are detained in important committee meetings.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. BENSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] are unavoidably detained.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] is detained on matters pertaining to the Pennsylvania flood.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] is absent on official business at the Department of Labor in connection with research work having to do with the Reynolds-Starnes bill.

The present occupant of the chair announces a pair on this question between the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Maryland would vote "yea", and the Senator from West Virginia would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—53

So the bill was passed.

DECLINE IN NATIONAL-BANK FAILURES

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is deemed appropriate to bring to the attention of the Senate a brief Associated Press dispatch, published in the Washington Post of this date, relating to the decline in the number of national-bank failures during the years of 1934 and 1935.

There has been furnished me a memorandum showing the number of national-bank failures that have occurred in the United States from 1912 until 1935. In the first year mentioned the number was 18; in 1913 there were 5 such failures; in 1914 there were 21; in 1915 there were 12; in 1916 the number of failures was 13; in 1917 it was 7; in 1918 there were 2; in 1919 there was 1; in 1920 there were 6; in 1921 there were 38; in 1922 there were 32; in 1923 there were 51; in 1924 there were 127; in 1925 there were 95; in 1926 there were 91; in 1927 there were 111; in 1928 there were 52; in 1929 there were 71; in 1930 there were 88; in 1931 there were 357; in 1932 there were 322; in 1933 there were 438; in 1934 there was only 1; and in 1935 there were only 4.

The statement to which I have referred as an Associated Press dispatch attributes to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation a stabilizing influence. As all Senators understand, deposits in the banks under a maximum of $5,000 are guaranteed.

I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD the Associated Press dispatch to which reference has been made.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Mar. 23, 1936]

BANK FAILURES DECLINE TO FIVE DURING 1934-35—O'CONNOR REPORTS MARKED DROP DURING OPERATION OF DEPOSIT INSURANCE

In his annual report to Congress, J. F. T. O'Connor, Comptroller of the Currency, yesterday noted a "material improvement" in the banking situation, as reflected in periodic statements of condition.

The report, covering the period ended last October 31, said only five national banks had failed since inauguration of Federal deposit insurance, January 1, 1934.

These five institutions had deposits of only $5,440,000, compared with a peak of 438 national banks which suspended operations in 1933, involving deposits of $781,679,000.

"The stabilizing influence of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation", the report said, "and its contribution to the general welfare of banking in the Nation, cannot be overemphasized."

"Approximately 52,000,000 depositors are insured in 14,218 banks, and the deposits of approximately 98.5 percent of them are fully insured under the maximum of $5,000 protection."

Many of the statistics in the report had been made public previously.

OPERATION OF FOREIGN AND AMERICAN SHIPS IN FOREIGN TRADE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution requesting the Secretary of Commerce to furnish the Senate with information concerning ships and shipping policy, which information, I understand, is available in their research department, may be immediately considered.

The resolution was submitted at my request by the Democratic leader, the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and was referred to the Committee on Commerce. As I have said, the resolution merely asks for information, the Senator who is chairman of the Commerce Committee has no objection to the consideration of the resolution, and I hope that other Members will have none.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 260) submitted by Mr. ROBINSON (for Mr. TYDINGS) on March 19, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce is requested to furnish to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the following information: (1) A list of the most important acts of Congress governing the operation of American ships in foreign trade; (2) a brief summary of the handicaps which confront American-flag ships when competing with ships of a foreign flag; (3) show how these handicaps result in higher operating costs to the American ship-owners; (4) whether it is the general practice of American ship-owners to purchase fuel and supplies in this country or abroad, and the approximate annual amount of such purchases for all foreign-trade ships of the American merchant marine; (5) whether it is the general practice of foreign shipowners to purchase fuel and supplies in this country or abroad, and the approximate annual amount of such purchases for all foreign-flag ships trading with the United States and its possessions; (6) the estimated percentage of the relative operating costs of ships flying the flags of Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, and Japan, on the basis of 100 percent for ships flying the flag of the United States; (7) the percentage of American trans-Atlantic cargo carried by American-flag ships, and the percentage carried by foreign-flag ships; (8) the percentage of American trans-Pacific cargo carried by American-flag ships, and the percentage carried by foreign-flag ships; (9) the profit or loss of the six American lines operating the largest American-flag tonnage for the years 1926, 1928, 1930, 1932, 1934, and 1935; (10) the operating expenses of the same lines for the same years and their gross incomes for such years; (11) how many of such lines held mail contracts, either on a poundage or per-mile basis, and the aggregate amount of money paid to them under such contracts; and (12) what formula do you generally recommend as a matter of United States policy which would deal fairly with all shipping lines, large or small, for the carrying of the mail?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the resolution has been referred to the Committee on Commerce. I inquire if that committee has reported the resolution?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; it has not; but I may say to the Senator from Oregon that, inasmuch as the resolution merely requests information, it was my intention to ask its sponsor to submit it and have it lie on the table, from which position I could have called it up, but I found that it had gone to the Committee on Commerce during my absence. I have consulted the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and, inasmuch, I repeat, as the resolution merely asks for information, I did not think there would be any objection to it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is quite unusual to take from a committee a resolution which has been referred to it and to seek action on it without a report from the committee. Secondly, the resolution not only calls for information but calls for the opinion and the judgment of the Secretary of Commerce upon legislation now pending. I object to the resolution being now considered. It must proceed in the orderly way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. COPELAND subsequently, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 260) requesting certain information concerning the operation of foreign ships and of American ships engaged in foreign trade, reported it without amendment.

STOCKYARDS AND MEAT PACKING

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1424) to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921.

Mr. CAPPER obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator about to speak on his motion?

Mr. CAPPER. I wish to address the Senate on my motion to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1424.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that the so-called Capper bill?

Mr. CAPPER. It is.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CAPPER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely seek information from the Senator from Kansas. Is it his purpose to press the bill to consideration, or is it his purpose later to allow the bill to go over, as I understood from some remarks would be done? I desire to know, as I am interested on the opposition side of the bill.

Mr. CAPPER. My motion is that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill so as to make it the unfinished business, and then probably it will be laid aside temporarily, and its consideration resumed later.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the situation is about as follows: Some days ago the Senator from Kansas moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the certain bill. That motion was entered and is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Kansas desires to have that motion disposed of before proceeding to discuss the bill. Is there any objection by any Senator to that course being pursued?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator from Kansas having the bill taken up, but I shall resist any real consideration because I expect to submit a motion to recommit the bill as soon as the Senator from Kansas shall have explained its purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what the Senator from Kansas wants to do is to proceed in the orderly fashion, namely, to take up his motion which he entered a few days ago. If that motion shall be agreed to, then the bill will become the unfinished business of the Senate. At that time he is willing to lay it aside temporarily to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Agricultural Department appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not believe there should be any objection to the motion which the Senator from Kansas has made. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has indicated his intention to move to recommit the bill. After the bill has been proceeded with, of course, that motion would be in order. The Senator from Kansas quite naturally would prefer to have the bill before the Senate rather than the mere motion to proceed to its consideration when he makes his address in explanation of the purposes of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not object, of course, to the Senator moving to take up the bill, but I shall object to its being taken up and shall oppose that action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I believe, if the Chair will pardon me, that the Chair is a little premature. The Senator from Kansas had the floor to address the Senate, as I understood, in behalf of his motion to take up the bill and I indicated that it was my purpose to oppose its being taken up.

Mr. CAPPER. No; Mr. President, I wanted a vote on my motion first, and then to address myself to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was agreed to and the Chair so announced.

Mr. KING. May I say in all deference to the Chair that the Chair acted prematurely, but I shall not challenge the ruling of the Chair.

The motion having been agreed to, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1424) to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, without amendment.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I think it will expedite the consideration of the pending bill if I make a brief statement setting forth the purposes of the bill which I have introduced proposing to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act.

Since the enactment of the original Packers and Stockyards Act in 1921, evasion by packers has developed, as shown by evidence before the Senate committee, mainly along three lines:

First, by packers operating private stockyards not subject to the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture as provided for under the act.

Second, by packers diverting the purchases of livestock formerly made at public stockyards to privately operated concentration points or private stockyards operated by others.

Third, by packers purchasing larger percentages of the livestock slaughtered directly from the livestock producers.

An outstanding example of what the packers are doing to break down the public market is found in Kansas City. When the Packers and Stockyards Act went into effect in 1921 the packers were buying direct from the farmer only a small percentage of their needs. Last year about three-fourths of the hog supply of the Kansas City markets was purchased by the packers direct from the farmers. Only half a million head of hogs were handled through the public market, while 1,500,000 were handled by the unsupervised private stockyards set up by the packers. With almost complete control of the hog supply it is an easy matter for the packers to fix the market price not only at their own private stockyards but at the public stockyards as well.

The amendments proposed to be made by the pending bill—and let me say here that the legislation is proposed in no spirit of hostility to the packing industry—only extend supervision by the Secretary of Agriculture to the acquisition of livestock by packers at packer-owned stockyards and at concentration points or other stockyards where packers annually acquire more than 35,000 head of livestock. This does not extend the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture to the supervision of direct purchases of livestock by packers from farmers. It does not prohibit any form of livestock purchase by packers, but is wholly regulatory in character. It relates to stockyards and packers operating in interstate commerce and does not in any manner attempt to regulate intrastate operations in the livestock industry.

The power of supervision as to stockyards and market agencies operating on stockyards given to the Secretary of Agriculture by the original act only permits the Secretary to prohibit unjust, unreasonable, and discriminatory rates, practices, and charges by stockyards or market agencies under his supervision engaged in interstate commerce within the definition of the act. It allows him to know the prices paid for livestock in individual transactions on those stockyards.

The exercise of this jurisdiction on the public markets now under regulation has not interfered with or limited the right of the individual owner to buy or sell livestock on his own account at any of the markets under regulation. The seller may sell and the buyer may buy on those markets without the intervention or employment of a market agency or commission firm. It does not require a seller or a buyer to give a bond or register as a dealer if he is the owner of the livestock. At many of the stockyards now under supervision a representative of the Secretary is seldom seen. Action is taken only upon complaint of unfair practice. Thousands of head of livestock now pass through the public markets direct from producer to packer without being consigned to any market agency. Therefore the extension of the supervision of the Secretary to private stockyards, where packers purchase more than 35,000 head of livestock annually, as provided in the bill I am now asking the Senate to pass, will not in any way prejudice or affect honest transactions at those markets carried on directly between packer and producer. The effect will be merely to let in the light of day where now darkness exists and to prohibit price discriminations.

Mr. President, the proposed amendment to the Packers and Stockyards Act does not give the Secretary of Agriculture power to regulate, supervise, or prohibit sales or purchases of stocker or feeder livestock at loading points or concentration points. The power of the Secretary to supervise the interstate transactions of sale or purchase in respect to stocker and feeder livestock is not in any manner to be extended by this amendment. The changes proposed to be made in the law apply only to slaughter livestock sold to packers, and then only where such slaughter livestock is acquired at stockyards not now supervised, but which are either operated by packers or at which more than 35,000 head of livestock are bought by packers annually for slaughter in interstate commerce. The small intrastate packer is not within the provisions of the original act or the amended act now before us.

The act now contains no penalties applicable to violations of its provisions by interstate packers. This amendment authorizes the Secretary to revoke the registration of packing plants where the packer fails to obey orders lawfully made by the Secretary under the provisions of the act, provides that violations by packers shall be punishable by a fine, and gives to the Secretary the right of access to the books of packers. The present law has been construed by the courts not to give him such right. This decision was made by the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, in actions to restrain the Secretary, and is reported in Fifteenth Federal Reporter, second series, page 133.

Another provision prohibits the purchase of livestock by interstate packers for the purpose of feeding and fattening them before slaughter. This provision does broaden the authority of the Secretary under the act. It is in line with resolutions of various livestock associations, including the American National Livestock Association, and, under the evidence before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is necessary in order to restrain unfair competition by packers with farmer-feeders and to prevent price manipulation in respect to livestock resulting from packer control of large-scale feeding operations. It is, however, an independent feature of the amendment. The clause proposed is similar to the commodities clause of the Transportation Act, which prohibits railroads transporting property owned by themselves not useful for railroad operations.

This provision has been upheld as to railroads; and inasmuch as Chief Justice Taft, in an opinion of the Supreme Court—Stafford against Wallace—described packers, stockyards, and market agencies engaged in interstate commerce as great national public utilities, it is likely this clause limiting the packers to the processing of livestock and sale of livestock products will meet Court approval.

Another section authorizes the Secretary to establish reasonable rules and regulations relating to the weighing, fill, dockage, or grading of livestock in interstate commerce. A specific provision is inserted in this section denying to the Secretary the right to employ or designate weighers, graders, or dockers of livestock. The only thing he can do under this section is to establish, after hearing, reasonable rules and regulations. Evidence before the committee emphasized the importance of standard and uniform practices in respect to this matter. This is also an independent feature of the bill.

Sections 8 to 13 of the bill relate to administrative features of the original act, and are designed to improve enforcement. They constitute largely a part of the law as now enacted, combining, however, enactments heretofore forming a part of annual appropriation bills with amendments to the act. Section 6 of the bill is wholly a reenactment of the original act, with the incorporation of an amendment thereto, now appearing as a part of the annual appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture. To a large extent this is true of section 9. Section 10 extends to the accounts and records of packers provisions now applicable to stockyards and market agencies, authorizes the Secretary to request annual reports from packers, and gives him access to their records for the purpose of checking these reports. It is similar in form to the provisions long constituting a part of the Interstate Commerce Act, now the Transportation Act, in respect to interstate carriers.

On the whole, except for the prohibition of packer feeding of livestock, the bill relates entirely to administrative improvements in the original act designed to give the Secretary of Agriculture more accurate information about the packing industry. It has been repeatedly endorsed by the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and the Farmers' Union, as well as by the National Agricultural Conference at its last two annual meetings in Washington.

If enacted into law, the Capper bill would amend the Packers and Stockyards Act by including additional provisions, as follows:

The bill would—

First. Prohibit operations of unsupervised stockyards by packers, and prohibit packers from engaging in feeding operations. All packer stockyards are now free from Federal supervision under the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921.

Second. Provide for the registration by packers of all packing plants operated in interstate commerce, and give to the Secretary of Agriculture the right to require reasonable bonds to cover purchases of livestock.

Third. Provide for penalties to be imposed on packers in the event of violation of provisions of the act in respect to packers.

Fourth. Provide for the establishment of just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory rates, practices, and charges in respect to all stockyards presently posted, and all others where over 35,000 head of livestock are annually sold to packers.

Fifth. Provide for the establishment by the Secretary, after hearing, of uniform rules and regulations relating to grading, weighing, filling, and dockage of livestock bought by packers in interstate commerce.

Sixth. Provide for access by the Secretary of Agriculture to the books and records of packers.

If enacted into law, the Capper bill—

First. Would not prohibit or restrict direct buying of livestock by packers for delivery direct to the packing plant.

Second. Would not give to the Secretary of Agriculture any right which does not now exist to supervise stockyard operations with respect to stocker and feeder livestock, whether on the open range or through the terminal markets.

Third. Would not provide for the employment of Government weighers and graders of livestock.

Fourth. Would not impose added expense upon the industry, and should result in very little added expense to the Government.

Mr. President, the purpose of the bill I am now asking the Senate to enact is to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921. The bill in its present form, and as reported favorably to the Senate, is an amended and limited version of no less than seven separate bills introduced in the Senate having the same general object in view, namely, strengthening the act in respect to the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture to regulate interstate commerce in livestock passing through stockyards on its route from the producers in the West and Central West to the meat-consuming centers of the Nation. The printed record of hearings upon these bills held before your Committee on Agriculture and Forestry comprises more than 1,000 printed pages of record.

The first bill on this subject, S. 2094, was introduced in 1923, and extensive hearings were had before the committee in 1924. The evidence before the committee at that time disclosed that the larger packers, immediately upon the passage of the Packers and Stockyards Act in 1921, had commenced very greatly to expand the operation of so-called private stockyards controlled by these packers, and that Attorney General Harry Daugherty had rendered an opinion to the Secretary of Agriculture that such stockyards were not subject to supervision as stockyards by the Secretary under the provisions of title III of the act relating to stockyards.

The original bills introduced in the Senate, and out of which the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921, was developed—namely, the Kenyon-Kendrick bill and the Gronna bill—so defined the term "stockyards" as to include all stockyards where packers purchased livestock in interstate commerce, irrespective of whether such yards were public or private. It will also be recalled that the Federal Trade Commission, in reporting in 1920 to President Woodrow Wilson upon its investigation of the meat-packing industry undertaken at his request, particularly condemned the arrangements then existing whereby packers "controlled the facilities through which livestock was sold to them." When these packers were threatened with prosecution by Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, the famous packers' consent decree was entered by agreement in the District of Columbia. It provided that the national packers affected should divest themselves of all control over and all interest in public stockyards. Unfortunately, the decree contained no provision with reference to the operation of private stockyards. It will also be recalled that the senior Senator La Follette at one time made the charge on the floor of the Senate that the packers had succeeded, by amendments inserted in the original Kenyon-Kendrick and Gronna bills, in practically writing themselves out of the regulation established by the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921.

No report was made to the Senate by the committee upon Senate bill 2094. If enacted, it would have made unlawful any course of action engaged in by any packer in interstate commerce tending to divert the purchase of livestock slaughtered at packing plants owned by such packer from the competitive markets at stockyards posted by the Secretary under the act. It was a bill not only to control private stockyard operation by packers but to prohibit direct buying by packers for plants located at public markets. The bill was widely endorsed. The Kansas Livestock Association, a party to proceedings brought under the Packers and Stockyards Act as a result of which the Daugherty opinion was rendered, endorsed the bill and demanded its enactment. It was also supported by many other agricultural organizations, but met opposition from certain large producers of livestock in the West who were accustomed to deal directly with packers in the sale of their livestock.

In 1926 there was introduced before this body Senate bill 4387. This measure sought the same objective as the former bill, and in hearings before the committee there were pointed out the extensive increases that had occurred between 1923 and 1927 in the volume of receipts of livestock at private stockyards operated by packers. Particular attention was given to the increased receipts of hogs at the Mistletoe Stockyards, operated by Armour & Co. at Kansas City, in respect to which the total volume of receipts was shown to be rapidly outstripping the volume of receipts at the adjacent public stockyards in Kansas City, one of the largest in the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. Similar situations were shown to have developed in respect of private stockyards operated by the "big four" packers adjacent to the public stockyards at Chicago and East St. Louis. This bill was reported favorably to the Senate, but did not come to a vote.

In 1928 hearings were had upon two bills (S. 2506 and S. 3368) which expanded the definition of the term "stockyard" in the act to include any stockyard where livestock in commerce was sold in sufficient volumes or under such conditions as tended to establish or affect substantially the market value in commerce of livestock of similar character in the territory adjacent to such stockyard. These bills also gave to the Secretary the authority to deny certificates of public convenience to new stockyards seeking to engage in interstate commerce, the operation of which in his opinion would not be in the interest of the public convenience and necessity. These bills also contained a section amending the original act which proposed to give to the Secretary of Agriculture a more complete access to the accounts and records of packers, granting him the same rights in respect to such records as were extended under the original act in respect of stockyard operators and market agencies selling livestock on such stockyards.

In the evidence brought before the committee in 1928, further increases were shown in the volume of livestock acquired by packers through private stockyards. The proportion of the total of livestock slaughtered by packers remaining in the current of commerce regulated by the act was rapidly declining. Widespread endorsement of this proposed legislation by individual stockmen and livestock organizations appears in the record of hearings held in 1928 on those bills. The dangers of the situation and the detrimental effect of the developing practices to producers of livestock, were pointed out in a communication from Secretary of Agriculture Jardine. The endorsements then, as now, included not only the Kansas Livestock Association, whose membership included the production of more than 75 percent by volume of meat animals sold to packers coming from the State of Kansas, but also farm bureaus and individual producers and growers and feeders of livestock in Nebraska, Minnesota, Iowa, and other States.

While these bills received the endorsement of most of the major farm organizations, opposition developed on account of clauses contained in the bills which would have authorized the Secretary to prohibit the acquisition by packers in interstate commerce of livestock through direct and off-market purchases. No report was made by the committee in respect of these bills.

In 1934 extensive hearings were had upon the three bills—S. 2133, S. 2621, and S. 3064—to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, as a result of which and in order to relieve the proposed legislation from any possibility of legitimate objections arising from an attempt to extend the power of the Secretary of Agriculture into fields not contemplated by the original act, the present bill, Senate bill 1424, approved by the committee for passage, was substituted. In the last hearings had before the committee the proposed legislation in its present form received the endorsement of the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Farmers' Union, the American Farm Congress, the National Grange, the United States Livestock Association, the Illinois Agricultural Association, and a great many other farm and livestock associations. Memorial resolutions adopted by the Legislatures of the States of Kansas, Wisconsin, and Nebraska, requesting legislation of this character, were presented to the committee. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 470.)

Mr. President, it was pointed out to the Senate committee by competent livestock statisticians that the share of the total sum spent by consumers for pork products received by the hog producers as of the year 1932 had diminished by more than $400,000,000 from what it would have been had the producer in 1932 received the same percentage of what the consumer paid as he received in 1913. It was shown that consumers were paying approximately the same amount for meat in 1932 as they paid in 1933, and that the producers were receiving approximately one-half as much for their hogs, while packing and retailing margins were approximately twice as large.

It would certainly seem to be true that this matter has been before the Senate for a sufficient length of time to permit a careful consideration in committee of the general subject; that the hearings held by the committee had been attended by representatives of all the interests affected; and that no sound reason can be given for further delay, particularly in view of the limited scope of the measure proposed.

Due to the fact that bills heretofore introduced and considered in committee have been much broader in the controls sought to be established over livestock marketing and processing, misrepresentation—unintentional as well as perhaps intentional—has been current in respect to the provisions of this bill. Although the report on direct marketing prepared by economists in the Bureau of Agricultural Economics at the direction of Secretary Henry A. Wallace inferentially suggests that the authority of the Secretary under the Packers and Stockyards Act be enlarged to permit the employment of graders or weighers of livestock purchased direct, or without supervision by interstate packers, the present bill expressly denies to the Secretary such authority, but does, as suggested in this report, authorize the Secretary after hearing to provide regulations whereby nationally uniform grades may be established in respect to the purchase of livestock by packers.

Mr. President, I have here a large number of telegrams, memorials, and petitions from farm and livestock groups, signed by their officers, speaking for more than a million farmers and stockmen, who ask Congress to enact this proposed legislation.

I have here a telegram signed by L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, dated March 5, 1936:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 5, 1936.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

United States Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

A majority of the executive committee of the National Grange, in session here today, endorse the fundamental principles of S. 1424, and urge its passage.

L. J. TABER,
Master, National Grange.

A telegram dated March 5, 1936, signed by Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, says:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 5, 1936.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The board of directors of American Farm Bureau Federation, in session in Chicago on March 5, 1935, unanimously endorsed your measure (S. 1424) to give the Secretary of Agriculture authority to assemble information which will disclose the best methods to be followed in marketing livestock. We recommend that the definition of stockyard contain not less than 35,000 head of livestock handled annually.

EDW. A. O'NEAL, President.

That is the provision of the bill as it is now before the Senate.

Here is another telegram dated Chicago, March 6, 1936, signed by Charles A. Ewing, president, National Livestock Marketing Association:

NATIONAL LIVESTOCK MARKETING ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, Ill., March 6, 1936.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

Senate Office Building:

In regard to amendments to Packers and Stockyards Act as provided in S. 1424. The National Livestock Marketing Association, representing 25 member cooperative livestock marketing associations operating upon 23 public livestock markets, who have handled an average of over 111,000 carloads of livestock annually during past 4 years for approximately 300,000 livestock-producer members and patrons, is vitally interested in above bill and strongly urges its passage.

CHARLES A. EWING, President.

From the report of the proceedings of the National Agricultural Conference, participated in by practically all the leading farm and livestock organizations of the country, which met at Washington, D. C., January 16 and 17, 1936, I quote the following:

We approve the type of legislation contained in the Capper-Hopewearin bills, extending the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to regulating direct buying of livestock.

I have here resolutions adopted by the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the National Farmers' Union, as follows:

Resolution adopted at the Thirty-first Annual Convention of the National Farmers' Union held at Kankakee, Ill., November 19, 1935, opposing direct buying of livestock

Whereas the big meat-packing industries of the country have organized themselves into an organization for the purpose of furthering the purchasing of livestock direct from the farmers, which is detrimental to the best interests of the livestock producers of the Nation and which makes it possible for the packers to arbitrarily establish the price of livestock to the producer without competition, as well as to fix the price to the consumer; and

Whereas under this method of purchasing livestock the packers are able to defeat the essence of cooperative marketing, which is the power of collective bargaining, by strangling the principle of determining prices by competition at the terminal markets: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to this vicious method of direct buying, and that our officers and directors are hereby instructed to use all means at their command to secure legislation that will give to the producer of livestock the same rights and privileges as are enjoyed by the meat packers, namely, to fix a price for their livestock equal to cost of production.

The National Cooperative Council, in a letter signed by Robin Hood, secretary-treasurer, says:

NATIONAL COOPERATIVE COUNCIL,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1936.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: In behalf of all cooperatives affiliated with the National Cooperative Council, I desire to urge immediate passage of the bill to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, which bears your name and which has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture.

The attitude of the council was expressed by the delegates in adopting unanimously the following resolution:

"We endorse the principles of legislation designed to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act to place under the control of that act any stockyards handling 35,000 head or more of cattle each year and having over 20,000 square feet or more of space. Such an amendment is necessary for the protection of the livestock producer."

I am attaching a list of the cooperative groups, about 30 in number, which have committed themselves to the measure by adoption of this resolution.

Very truly yours,

ROBIN HOOD,
Secretary-Treasurer, National Cooperative Council.

I have here a statement made just 2 weeks ago by the Farmers Union organizations at Omaha, Nebr.

RESOLUTION AND STATEMENT OF FARMERS UNION ORGANIZATION AT OMAHA, ON MARCH 14, 1936

At a conference of leaders of farmers' cooperative associations, in an all-day session, to discuss the existing livestock-marketing situation, in which representatives from Denver, Colo.; St. Paul, Minn.; Wichita, Kans.; Kansas City, Mo.; Sioux City, Iowa; St. Joseph, Mo.; East St. Louis, Ill.; and Chicago, Ill., speaking for more than 20,000 livestock producers, were present, William Hirth, of Missouri, was elected chairman of the resolutions committee, and the following resolution was prepared and submitted to be forwarded to Senator CAPPER, to be included in the resolutions that will be filed in support of S. 1424.

In our opinion, the Capper-Hope-Wearin bill, which is now pending in Congress, and which has been favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, contains certain provisions and reforms to which our livestock producers are justly entitled, and we feel sure that we voice the overwhelming sentiment of the livestock producers of the great Corn Belt States when we ask Congress to enact this law as speedily as possible.

We concede that the Roosevelt administration has been sincere in its efforts to help agriculture, and, while the price the farmer receives for his livestock and other products is fundamental, yet, unless the machinery through which these products are marketed is free from wrongful practices, a fair price to the farmer is often defeated, and it is in the latter connection that we earnestly request the early enactment of the Capper-Hope-Wearin bill.

We wish to embrace this opportunity to impress upon Congress, and especially upon farmers that, through the process of marketing livestock direct to the packers, our great central competitive markets are becoming mere shadows of their former effectiveness in establishing fair prices, and as a result the packer is more and more getting into a position where he can fix his own price upon the farmers' cattle, hogs, and sheep, and we challenge the truth of any report or finding to the contrary.

So rapidly has direct buying progressed during the last 10 years that today 50 percent of the Nation's hogs and 25 percent of its cattle and 20 percent of its sheep are purchased in this manner.

² Units also market poultry products in quantity.

³ Also markets fresh vegetables.

⁴ Also markets citrus and deciduous fruits.

⁵ Units also market various farm products.

This process is constantly increasing and is losing our livestock producers many millions of dollars annually as against what they would receive if the old competitive central market forces were operative.

In addition to increasing their direct buying, the big packers are consistently buying out or otherwise removing small packers and important order buyers from important market centers in order to remove them as competitive factors and in order that they may more completely control livestock prices in such districts.

In this connection we desire to call attention to the remarkable fact that the freight rate on dressed meats and meat products from the Missouri River to the Pacific coast is 100 percent higher than live animals, while from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast the rate on dressed meats is 20 percent lower than on live animals, and the reason for this situation is as clear as it is astounding—the packers buy the animals they need in their Pacific coast killing plants direct from the producer, and hence are interested in a low live-animal freight rate, while through a high freight rate on live animals to the Atlantic coast they are more and more eliminating eastern packers and butchers as buyers in the Corn Belt markets.

We desire to remind Congress and the general public that the livestock producer is today receiving less than one-third of the consumers meat dollar and that in the final analysis livestock is the foundation of American agriculture. There can be no sound general farm condition in the United States that is not based on fair livestock prices.

In conclusion, we consider the existing condition of the livestock industry so precarious that we hereby suggest that during the coming fall the livestock producers of the Corn Belt States come together in a great central mass meeting to discuss this situation, and at the proper time those who have participated in today's conference expect to issue a call for such a meeting. The activities of the United States Department of Agriculture, in seeking to control the production of corn and hogs, also makes a common understanding in these premises increasingly imperative to the end that our farmers may have a greater voice in deciding what shall or shall not be done.

Resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas are as follows:

Resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas, January 1934

Whereas since the livestock producers of the United States are in justice entitled to open and competitive markets for the sale of their livestock and since the practice of direct marketing has expanded and is expanding to such an extent that it is seriously interfering with free and open competition of livestock marketing at our public markets; and

Whereas since the principle of maintaining the two systems of marketing livestock at and adjacent to the public markets is economically unsound and adverse to the best interests of the livestock producers: Be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas (the senate concurring therein), That they hereby request and urge the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States to take immediate action and place under Federal supervision all private stockyards adjacent to or within the switching zones of the public livestock markets, and in the event it is determined that the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States is not provided with sufficient authority under the law to regulate such markets: Then be it

Resolved, That we ask the Congress to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 so that such authority may be extended to the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

I have here a statement from D. M. Hildebrand, president of the United States Livestock Association, received by me within the past week. He says:

I am quite certain that examination of the bill S. 1424 will disclose that these amendments are in the interest of livestock producers as well as in the interest of all packers who desire to conform to reasonable governmental supervision of their operations in purchasing livestock in interstate commerce. The bill does not restrict direct purchase by packers of livestock from farmers. It does place private stockyards, where more than 35,000 head of animals are annually sold to packers in interstate commerce, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, and subjects such stockyards to the same regulations as now relate to public stockyards throughout the country. These regulations have not proved burdensome to either operators of stockyards or producers patronizing these markets. Many new public stockyards have been established in small cities during the last year. The bill will not make it necessary for western producers who sell direct to packers to change their present practices. It is manifest that Federal regulation of the marketing of livestock in interstate commerce cannot effectively proceed under the present Packers and Stockyards Act with 50 percent or more of the livestock escaping the supervision provided through the operation by packers of private stockyards or concentration points. Continuation of the present trend means the break-down of livestock marketing as organized in the United States of and by livestock producers and turning the marketing function over to the packers or purchasers. Evidence before the Senate committee indicated that the disintegration of marketing facilities operated by representatives of the producer occurring during the past decade paralleled a depression in the percentage of the consumer's meat dollar passed back to the producers of livestock, thus indicating a greatly weakened producer's bargaining power as a result of the disorganized marketing.

I believe this legislation is definitely in the interest of the livestock producer, and that the upbuilding of the bargaining power of farmers in such a manner as to enable them to secure a larger share of what the ultimate consumer pays for farm products is of the utmost importance to agriculture and the national welfare.

Yours very truly,

D. M. HILDEBRAND,

President, United States Livestock Association.

SEWARD, NEBR., March 6, 1936.

I have also a letter from Glenn T. Stebbins, executive secretary of the United States Livestock Association, received by me within the past week. He says:

Packer interests have arranged to block a vote on the Capper bill, S. 1424, by a move to have the bill returned to committee, according to information reaching us this morning.

As you well know, such a move would kill any possibility of action as far as this session of Congress is concerned.

During these past few years while Congress has been voting relief to agriculture, the packers have made money; they have turned profit out of Government contracts and now they have contrived to keep impounded processing taxes to which they have no moral claim and which rightfully belong to producers or consumers, or both.

For 10 years farmers, farm organizations, and stockmen have labored to secure the much-needed relief represented in the Capper amendments. During this time repeated consideration has been given the question by committees and many hearings have been held. There is no valid reason for further delay.

Now, all we are asking is that the Capper bill, S. 1424, be voted on by the Senate at the earliest possible moment. This request is made on behalf of 75,000 members in 42 States and on behalf of the livestock industry in general.

The following resolution was adopted at the annual meeting of the United States Livestock Association at Omaha, Nebr., February 27, 1936.

We urge the passage by Congress of the Capper-Hope-Wearin amendments to the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921 in the form now presented by Capper bill, S. 1424, pending on the calendar of the United States Senate. The provisions of this legislation restricting the activity of packers in feeding and finishing livestock for slaughter, applying reasonable supervisory rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture to private as well as public stockyards, and the access given to the Secretary of Agriculture to packers' books and records to the same extent as he now has access to the books and records of other agencies engaged in livestock distribution are particularly commended.

That provision of the Capper-Hope-Wearin bills favoring the regulation of country buying and prohibiting the feeding of livestock by packers met with unanimous approval.

I have here a communication from the Central Cooperative Association, of St. Paul, Minn., signed by C. B. Crandall, president, in which it is stated:

The Central Cooperative Association is for the Capper bill, S. 1424. We have in the United States today 93 public markets, posted as such under the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. These centralized cash markets for livestock represent the outgrowth of early attempts on the part of producers of livestock to concentrate buying and selling in order to bring supply in contact with demand, so that fair and just prices could be determined. The establishment of price to the producer is still the principal function of the public market. Despite statements made to the contrary, the public markets of the United States have been universally accepted as the machinery set up for the establishment of prices within our livestock industry. The public markets have been developed by and for the livestock producer.

When a processor resorts to "direct buying" to secure his raw materials he does not patronize the method of marketing which producers of the livestock industry have built up for the sale of their products. He avoids the bargaining power which is created at the competitive markets for the producer. He avoids the competition of other buyers. By this method, supply territories frequently become divided among competitors. By this method the trained buyer avoids the skilled salesmen who are the agents of the producer on the public market. "Direct buyers" generally do the weighing, grade, and dock the hogs to suit themselves. In most instances they have the advantage from the standpoint of fill.

In addition to the control of these sale factors, which have a direct bearing on the sale value, the direct buyers generally mark the price ticket. Many farmers are excellent judges of livestock, but in most cases they are not trained to cope with the expert buyer of the packer, and for that reason, under the direct-buying system, the buyer generally handles both sides of the sale transaction.

It is rather interesting to note that when a farmer buys a product the seller names the price. When the farmer sells a product the seller still names the price. Does this appear to be just and fair to the farmer? On the livestock producer's side the problem is now that of securing bargaining power, and this can only be had through centralized control of the sale of his products.

C. B. CRANDALL,

President, Central Cooperative Association, St. Paul, Minn.

I have here a communication from the National Grange, signed by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative, as follows:

The National Grange is heartily in favor of the enactment of S. 1424, amending the Packers and Stockyards Act and sponsored by Senator CAPPER. It seems to us that any legitimate objections to former bills of this nature have been met and that in the interest of the livestock industry as well as the general public the present bill should pass.

The following is a statement from the Farmers' National Union, by Edward E. Kennedy, national secretary, Kankakee, Ill.:

We believe that the Capper bill, known as S. 1424, which is now before the Senate, should be considered and enacted into law.

This bill is an amendment to the Packers and Stockyards Act (U. S. C. 7, ch. 9). Its principal purpose is to extend the jurisdiction of the law to include public markets operated as stockyards which handled more than 35,000 head of cattle, hogs, sheep, and goats during the preceding year—to make some of the discretionary provisions mandatory—the Secretary may require annual reports from packers and/or owners of such stockyards—records, etc., must be accessible to agents of the Secretary—packers are prohibited from purchasing cattle, hogs, and sheep, etc., for fattening before slaughter.

Since the original act was enacted the packers have undertaken to purchase the large portion of their current supplies of livestock for slaughter "direct" at so-called "assembling and concentration yards." This is particularly true in the case of hogs. A similar situation now exists at these "direct buying" yards that existed at the central markets prior to the passage of the original act, viz, monopoly by the packers of buyers, yards, facilities, services, feed. The farmer cannot have sales representation through his own cooperative organization.

The original act was necessary to correct similar monopolistic abuses at the large central markets. The present bill should be enacted now to restrain and regulate the present monopoly of yards, facilities, services, and price at the new market places and to protect the livestock producer and feeder from the irreparable injury and damage resulting from a continuation of this intolerable condition.

The packers cannot logically object to the enactment of this bill, which seeks to regulate the "public market places" at which they purchase all or nearly all of their livestock for slaughter, and at the same time not object to the original act which regulates the "public market places" at which they buy but a portion of their livestock for slaughter.

We are enclosing a marked copy of the legislative program of the National Farmers Union for your information on this subject.

Respectfully yours,

EDW. E. KENNEDY,
National Secretary.

The following is a telegram I have received from J. H. Mercer, secretary of the Kansas State Livestock Department:

TOPEKA, KANS., March 9, 1936.

ARTHUR CAPPER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Kansas Livestock Association today passed the following resolution with respect to Capper bill: "We urge the passage by Congress of the Capper-Hope-Wearin amendments to the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921."

J. H. MERCER,
Secretary, Kansas State Livestock Department.

Here is a resolution adopted by the twenty-fourth national convention of the Farmers' Equity Union, with headquarters at Greenville, Ill., which was held in Goodland, Kans., January 30, 1935:

Be it resolved, That we recommend legislation to give the Secretary of Agriculture greater regulatory powers under the Packers and Stockyards Act for the purpose of carrying out its original object.

I have received the following resolution, adopted by the United States Livestock Association at its annual meeting February 23, 1935:

CAPPER-HOPE-WEARIN BILLS ENDORSED

We endorse the Capper-Hope-Wearin bills to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, which empower the Secretary of Agriculture to regulate and supervise the packing industry, to secure access to packers' books and records, and to assist in the establishment of better organized, more efficient, and fully coordinated system for the open competitive marketing of livestock; and we condemn as prejudicial to livestock producers the attempt of certain interests to arouse opposition to this legislation by misrepresentation of its contents and effect.

CONDEMN PACKER LIVESTOCK FEEDING

The feeding of livestock in large numbers by packers is increasing and represents an attempt by such packers to render themselves independent of the ordinary effect of competition in the acquisition of such livestock on open competitive markets. This practice has heretofore been objected to by livestock producers, and unless the request for its discontinuance are acceded to by packers the officers of this association are instructed to use every effort to secure a legislative prohibition of the practice.

We also direct attention to the recent announcement by packers that they are engaged in the operation of hatcheries and other facilities for the production of poultry. This represents a distinct menace to the home income of almost every farm family in the country and constitutes unfair competition for every farm woman who produces poultry.

The seventeenth annual convention of the American Farm Bureau Federation, held just a few weeks ago, adopted this resolution:

We favor broad, discretionary powers to the Secretary of Agriculture in the administration of the Packers and Stockyards Act, so as to adjust and regulate the handling and marketing of livestock as it moves in interstate commerce to the terminal markets.

We request that the Packers and Stockyards Act should be amended so that such records of processors and packers will be available to the Secretary of Agriculture as are necessary for determining the effects of the several types of marketing methods now in existence upon producers of livestock.

The National Grange at its annual session held at Hartford, Conn., November 14, 1934, adopted the following resolution:

We advocate the amendment of the Packers and Stockyards Act to provide for the more effective regulation by the Department of Agriculture of the marketing of livestock. Direct buying by the packers merely in an effort to evade the law and depress prices must not be further tolerated.

Packers should likewise be prevented from engaging in large-scale feeding projects, either directly or through financial interests.

The Kansas State Board of Agriculture at its recent annual meeting adopted the following resolution:

We approve the principles of the Capper-Hope bill and urge necessary revisions to conform with the practical needs of various phases of livestock marketing, in order to make the measure adapted to all portions of the country.

We also favor that authority be given to the United States Secretary of Agriculture to examine the records of processors and middlemen, that the interests of livestock producers may be protected.

I have here a petition signed by over a thousand producers of the Southwestern States asking for the immediate passage of the measure. The petition reads:

PETITION FOR PASSAGE OF THE CAPPER AND HOPE-WEARIN AMENDMENTS TO PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT

To the Congress:

We, the undersigned, as producers and shippers of livestock in your district, urgently petition and request you to carefully investigate Senate file no. 3064, introduced by Senator CAPPER, of Kansas. This bill is supported by Congressman WEARIN, of Iowa, and Congressman HOPE, of Kansas, with similar bills. These bills are amendments to the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921. They are for the purpose of regulating direct buying of livestock, especially direct buying of hogs, in the country.

Direct hog buying is freely acknowledged by packers themselves as being a means of lowering hog prices. Farmers generally fully understand the disastrous effects of direct hog buying, but the methods used by packers and the conditions prevailing throughout the livestock territory make it impossible for any single farmer or any group of farmers to effectively stop or curtail the direct hog-buying practices of the meat packers. The only positive means of correcting this evil, which reduced farmer returns for hogs by hundreds of millions of dollars, is through Federal legislation. The Capper and Hope-Wearin amendments are a remedy, approved by every major farm organization in America. We urge your support of this legislation for the benefit of all livestock producers and shippers.

J. A. MURPHY
(And Over 1,000 Stockmen and Farmers of Clay and Marion Counties, in the State of Kansas).

The following is a resolution adopted by the National Farmers Union at its annual meeting declaring for the enactment of the legislation I am sponsoring:

The National Farmers' Union goes on record as being unalterably opposed to the direct purchasing of livestock, such as is being practiced by the big packers at this time, by which they are thwarting the intent and purpose of the open competitive terminal marketing system, where values of livestock are established.

We recommend to our national president, who is our legislative representative at Washington, D. C., to take such steps as are necessary to have the Sherman antitrust law invoked to stop this vicious practice in restriction of trade such as was done by the attorney general of Nebraska in 1929. This unwritten agreement between the large processors of meat in allotting territory in which there is no competition places the producer of livestock at the mercy of the packing industry to establish prices on their commodities.

And we further recommend that our national president exert every effort available at his command to bring to the attention of the United States Senate and Congress the necessity of amending the Packers and Stockyards Act to bring under its jurisdiction all independent packing-plant stockyards and all other livestock markets where a thousand head of livestock is sold daily. We also ask that a copy of this demand be wired President F. D. Roosevelt.

The following is a statement received from E. E. Kennedy, national secretary of the Farmers Union:

The Capper-Hope-Wearin bill (S. 1424) to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921, brings concentration yards, having an area of more than 20,000 square feet, or which receive and handle more than 35,000 head of cattle, sheep, swine, and goats a year, under the jurisdiction of the Packers and Stockyards Act as a public market.

Under this bill the packers would be prohibited from:

(1) Owning, etc., stockyards facilities, other than receiving pens at the packing plants of packers or stockyards posted under the title III of the act.

(2) Operating packing plants not registered with the Secretary of Agriculture and bonded to secure the performance of financial obligations.

(3) Purchasing, etc., cattle, sheep, or swine for fattening, etc., before slaughter.

The bill gives district courts jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus to compel compliance with the act and orders issued under it.

Market agents or dealers at "stockyards" are required to give bond to secure the performance of financial obligations. The Secretary may require that all reports, etc., of packers, stockyard owners, etc., be accessible to his agents.

These are the general provisions of the law, and we believe this law should be passed. It strikes at the "direct buying" of livestock by packers and is designed to give "concentration points" the same status regulation and control under the law as is the case now on terminal markets.

Mr. President, I hope we may have this measure enacted. It simply places the private markets, the stockyards, and the packers under the same supervision and Federal regulation provided for the public markets. I hope for speedy action on the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to make a motion. I do not care to discuss the motion at this time. I move that the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the pending unfinished business be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] may ask that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]? The Chair hears none.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the committee amendment, on page 89, after the numerals "$80,000" in line 9, it is proposed to insert a proviso, so as to make the amendment read:

Sea-food inspectors: For personal services of sea-food inspectors designated to examine and inspect sea food and the production, packaging, and labeling thereof upon the application of any packer of any sea food for shipment or sale within the jurisdiction of the Federal Food and Drugs Act, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend section 10A of the Federal Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, as amended", approved August 27, 1935 (49 Stat., p. 871), $80,000: Provided, That on and after July 1, 1937, receipts from fees authorized to be collected by the operations of Public Act No. 356, entitled "An act to amend section 10A of the Federal Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, as amended", shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts and hereafter appropriations for the operations under said act are authorized to be made annually out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, that completes the committee amendments.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I inquire if that is an individual amendment?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; it is.

Mr. McNARY. In conference with the acting Democratic leader it was agreed that individual amendments should not be taken up today.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was understood that after all committee amendments had been disposed of no individual amendments should be offered or considered until tomorrow, and that understanding was entered into between myself and the minority leader, after consultation with other Senators.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators interested in amendments which will be offered to the bill, and some of them have absented themselves with the understanding that such amendments would be offered tomorrow and not considered today.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct, and I desire to carry out that understanding.

Mr. HAYDEN. The amendment I wish to offer merely proposes to increase an appropriation by $6,000, the additional sum being for the study of pecans in Arizona. The amendment is fully justified on pages 164 to 167 of the hearings. The amendment was overlooked by me in the committee and I desire now to offer it.

Mr. McNARY. I favor the amendment. However, I stated to other Senators the understanding I had that we were to take up no individual amendments today, and they left the Chamber on the basis of that statement. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona be considered the pending amendment when we shall convene tomorrow.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am in accord with that understanding.

BOARD OF SHORTHAND REPORTING—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 189)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Senate:

I am returning without my approval S. 1453, Seventy-fourth Congress, entitled "An act to create a board of shorthand reporting, and for other purposes."

The bill would establish a national board of shorthand reporting, composed of three members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, under which would be established a system of examination and certification of Federal certified shorthand reporters. Provision is made for an examination fee of $25 and for defrayment of the expenses of the board from the fees collected. Sections 9 and 10 of the bill impose the requirement that no one but Federal certified shorthand reporters may be permanently employed for shorthand reporting of oral testimony in the judicial or executive branches or independent agencies of the Government.

I have found in the executive departments and establishments two principal objections to this bill:

First. It provides for the establishment of a distinct and separate organization for the performance of functions that would normally be lodged, insofar as the interests of the Government are concerned, in an already existing agency, namely, the Civil Service Commission.

Second. The provisions of sections 9 and 10 of the bill would involve largely increased expenditures and add materially to the difficulties of office administration through their requirements that no one but Federal certified shorthand reporters may be permanently employed for shorthand reporting of oral testimony in the judicial or executive branches or independent agencies of the Government.

Many hearings are held by agencies of the Government where oral testimony is reported in a sufficiently satisfactory manner for the purposes of such hearings by regular stenographers who receive annual salaries of no more than $2,000. To require the employment for this work of Federal certified shorthand reporters at the largely increased rates of compensation that would be paid to persons of such qualifications would entail expenditures that could not be justified.

I think that these objections are well taken, and I am, therefore, withholding my approval of this bill.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 21, 1936.

SALARIES AND POSITIONS OF CERTAIN SENATE EMPLOYEES

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] to Senate Resolutions 252 and 253. I can briefly explain them.

In the last legislative appropriation act specific provision was made that each branch of the Congress, the Senate and the House, should for itself make provision for increasing the pay of certain employees. These resolutions seek to increase slightly the pay of some employees of the Sergeant at Arms and of the Secretary of the Senate. My able friend the Senator from Oregon has a similar resolution relating to certain employees. The resolutions recite all there is involved. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending appropriation bill may be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of considering the resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 252), submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the 12th instant, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby directed to make the following changes in salaries and positions under the supervision of the Secretary of the Senate, to wit:

Assistant financial clerk: Strike out "assistant financial clerk, $4,200" and insert "assistant financial clerk, $4,500."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The second resolution for which the Senator from Illinois asks consideration will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 253), submitted by Mr. LEWIS on the 12th instant, was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby directed to make the following changes in salaries and positions under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, to wit:

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have a resolution further carrying out the purposes of the appropriation bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 249) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations, or any subcommittee thereof having charge of the preparation of the bill making appropriations for the legislative establishment for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, is hereby directed to increase the number of clerks at $1,800 under the supervision of the Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper by one.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, who hath commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shine in our hearts that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us. Believing in Thy Holy Word and knowing of the pure earthly life of the Master, may we have thoughts that widen and purify the soul. Teach us how to make humility noble, how to make self-respect humble, and how to do justice to all men. Blessed Lord God, there come to our troubled spirits feelings that appall; they throw a strange, dark shadow on our peace and at times stagger our understanding. They remind us of human frailty and the utter weakness of all things material. We most earnestly pray that these days may cause a serious pause throughout our country. Keep it face to face with the virtues and claims of the higher life, realizing the essence of that which is divinely great and abiding. Almighty God, make the waste lands to rejoice; fill desolate dwelling places with comfort and courage; bless richly the children and fill their hearts with gladness, and stimulate man everywhere to be a lover of purity and a builder of happy homes. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of Friday, March 20, 1936, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the Senate Special Committee on Investigation of Lobbying Activities to employ counsel in connection with certain legal proceedings, and for other purposes.

THE FLOOD SITUATION—HARNESSING OUR RIVERS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the flood situation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I introduced a bill for the creation of a Potomac Valley Authority, to develop that historic stream, control its floods, improve navigation, and generate cheap hydroelectric power for the people in the District of Columbia and the surrounding States.

On Thursday last I stood upon the banks of that usually placid river and watched its turbulent waters roaring past in one of the most destructive floods of all time.

I saw bits of furniture, dead animals, and fragments of wrecked homes amid the nondescript debris that went rushing past on its foaming crest.

I saw hundreds of laborers toiling unremittingly to prevent its waters from spreading and inundating public buildings in the Nation's Capital.

As I looked upon those raging waters, turned almost to the color of gold by the soil and sand dragged down from the hills above, impoverishing this country in the years to come, I thought that indeed it might be termed a stream of gold, bearing to the sea its untold wealth of hydroelectric power, as well as carrying away the soil from which future generations must live.

I thought that here we are in the Capital of the greatest Nation on earth, in the midst of our boasted civilization, when mankind has gained the greatest ascendancy over the forces of nature, and the most complete command of his surroundings ever attained since the world began, letting this stream go on its "mad career of ruin", instead of harnessing it, controlling it, and bending its unmeasured energies to light the homes, reduce the burdens, increase the comforts, improve the health, and do the work and will of man.

I cannot believe that civilized America will stand thus idly by and see this devastation wrought from year to year along the rivers of our country and this unlimited wealth of power run waste and wanton to the sea merely because, forsooth, its development would run counter to certain greedy, selfish interests or the whims of misguided sentimentalists who are afraid its improvement might tend to "mar the scene."

As I gazed upon that "scene" last Thursday and contemplated the loss of human life, the destruction wrought, the devastation done to peaceful homes, the suffering of men, women, and children, all of which could be prevented in the future by the construction and operation of these dams, which in themselves would add to the scenic beauty, I wondered whether or not these selfish interests and silly sentimentalists would be permitted to block this progress in the years to come.

When I realized that this same devastation was being wrought upon other rivers—from the Susquehanna to the James; yes; from Maine to Mexico—and that people on the Ohio and the lower Mississippi were awaiting the inevitable approach of the devastating floods that now race through the streets of Pittsburgh, Pa., and Wheeling, W. Va., I thought that out of these disasters might come an awakening of the American people to the necessity of a national program for the development of our navigable streams, to control their floods, protect our soil, improve navigation, and provide the people of this great country with unlimited supplies of cheap hydroelectric power, to light every American home, and especially every farm home, at rates the people can afford to pay.

This would be one of the greatest steps forward ever taken by any country since time began.

It would pay for itself in a generation.

It would protect lives and property along our rivers, conserve our soil, enable us to electrify every farm home, at rates based upon the cost of production and distribution, and make this the richest, the most independent, the most powerful, the most prosperous, and the most contented country the world has ever known.

TENNESSEE-TOMBIGBEE CANAL

Mr. RANKIN. I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi:

House Concurrent Resolution No. 8—A concurrent resolution memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to cut a canal connecting the waters of Bear River and McKeys Creek, thereby turning a portion of the waters of the Tennessee River into the Gulf of Mexico

Whereas by the cutting of a canal connecting the waters of Bear River and McKeys Creek millions of dollars will be saved by the reduction of overflows on the lower Mississippi River; and

Whereas another water inlet and outlet will be opened up, whereby thousands of dollars will be saved on commercial transportation of products of the Tennessee Valley; and

Whereas it is known that there are billions of tons of building stone in Tishomingo County, Miss., and many billions of tons of iron-ore rock in northwest Alabama, and other natural resources of the earth that might be manufactured into useful products if a cheap rate of transportation is provided; and

Whereas thousands of acres of virgin soil will be made suitable for cultivation by taking the overflow water from the Tombigbee River Valley; and

Whereas we believe this canal would be of untold value for military purposes should this country ever become involved in another war with some foreign country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That we memorialize the President and Congress of the United States to cut the proposed canal already known as the Tennessee-Tombigbee Canal at as early a date as possible, connecting the waters of Bear River and McKeys Creek; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and each Member of Congress.

Adopted by the house of representatives February 7, 1936.

F. L. WRIGHT,

Speaker of the House of Representatives pro tempore.

Adopted by the senate March 13, 1936.

J. B. SNYDER,

President of the Senate.

LET US GIVE THE TAXPAYERS A BREAK BY ABOLISHING THE FEDERAL REGISTER

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.
There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, with principles of social justice now established under the leadership of our humanitarian President, and the darkest days of the depression over, I believe a prescription might be written in two words that would do more than anything else to hasten the coming of normal prosperity and universal happiness in this country. My prescription would be—

"Quit spending." When I advocate a cessation of spending I mean, of course, to stop all spending except such as is absolutely required to run the Government operations on a basis of the strictest economy and retrenchment and whatever additional sums may be necessary for direct relief, to keep men, women, and children from starving until regular jobs—God hasten that time—will be available to all who want to work.

My unemployed friends in this depression have been numbered by the thousands upon thousands of as good men and women as ever lived. It is humiliating to them to rake leaves or to labor at other "made work" that has no economic value, and the thought of having to subsist by the cold hand of charity is to them unbearable and unthinkable. My heart goes out to them and I want to do everything I can to help to lift them out of the slough where such things exist. Their cry is for regular jobs so that, in a manner becoming to the dignity of human beings, they may exercise their God-given right to earn a living for themselves and their loved ones.

Whether they get an opportunity to exercise that God-given right—the American Federation of Labor reports that there are still more than 12,000,000 unemployed—depends, I believe, to a large degree, on a restoration of strict economy in governmental affairs. The fear of debt and taxes paralyzes the business and industrial world, destroys initiative, and blocks recovery. When once it is understood that we are going to cut out useless bureaus and personnel and appropriate only for the bare necessities of government, economically administered, we shall see, in my opinion, a wonderful change in national psychology. People will take heart, cheer will displace gloom, confidence will be restored, and we shall then move forward to better times.

It is because I entertain these views that I declined to sign the petition which was designed to force the hand of the President against a reduction in the C. C. C. activity, notwithstanding several of the best friends I have in the House urged me to sign that petition. I believe the C. C. C. organization is one of the best of the New Deal activities, but when my President makes a move toward the retrenchment in government that is so much needed, and tries to bring about economies, I am not going to oppose him. I am going to do everything I can to strengthen his arm.

To my mind there is something grimly humorous in the phraseology of our bills which says that—there is hereby appropriated from the United States Treasury out of moneys not heretofore appropriated.

If anyone can find in the United States Treasury any moneys not heretofore appropriated many times over he is a better man than I am. And it is amazing to me that in our pell-mell course toward national bankruptcy we Members of Congress do not pause, think of the consequences, and stop a lot of these expenditures before they swell the vast ocean of our national indebtedness.

We have just experienced floods of the most disastrous character in many sections of the Union. In the wake of those floods will come misery and wretchedness indescribable. I am afraid that in the wake of our national spending is going to come more misery and wretchedness than most of us imagine. For this situation and prospect I do not hold the Congress free from blame. We give too much consideration to groups and blocs and not enough to the weal of the Nation as a whole. We need to get away from such dreamy projects as shelter belts for the arid States, where the good Lord will hardly permit a cactus to grow, and cease our efforts to harness the ocean for the benefit of a small section of New England, and we must cease piling up our appropriations mountain high for impractical and visionary objectives.

ECONOMY THROWN OUT OF THE WINDOW

When I say that Congress is not without fault I direct your attention to a concrete example.

The Appropriations Subcommittee, of which I am chairman, spent many long and wearisome weeks paring down the estimates for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year 1937; we cut off every dollar we thought could be eliminated without impairing the vital operations of the Government.

We brought to this House what we thought was a good bill. Certainly it was an economical bill. The House endorsed it and passed it. Then what happened? The body at the other end of the Capitol threw all of our good work into the discard and practically rewrote the bill, restoring the increases of appropriations and personnel which we of our subcommittee believe are indefensible. The bill as it passed the upper branch gives a pale and sickly look to Republican economy pledges and the plank in our last Democratic national platform in which we pledged a 25-percent cut in the normal operating expenses of the Government.

But my purpose in submitting these observations today is not so much to deliver a general homily on economy in government as it is to point out specifically one expenditure which I think should be stopped and stopped immediately, before another dollar is spent on it.

THE FEDERAL REGISTER

That is the expenditure for the publication of what is known as the Federal Register. In my opinion that expenditure should be stopped because it is wasteful and because the Federal Register does not have a value the size of a grain of mustard seed. We have already carried in this year's appropriation bills a total of $289,760 for this publication.

The cost per annum of publication of just the current governmental orders in this Register, which is to be issued 5 days a week, will be more than a quarter of a million dollars or, to be exact, $263,320, provided there is no expansion of the present personnel which would be contrary to the usual bureaucratic experience. This includes $225,000, the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office, and $38,320, the salary roll of the division now engaged in preparing the copy for the Public Printer.

Now, mind you, this does not include the cost of printing any of the vast accumulation of regulations, orders, proclamations, and so forth, running back for a period of more than 50 years in our country's history. What it will cost to print those only the Lord knows. Mr. Giegengack, the able Public Printer, does not know, for he testified before our legislative subcommittee on appropriations as follows:

It is impossible to give any idea as to what it will eventually cost to print the present accumulation of existing orders, proclamations, and regulations that now have the force and effect of law. It has been stated that there are literally truck loads of them and that the Archivist would need to increase his building 100 percent in order to hold them all.

Yet under the amazing act for the creation of the Federal Register it is directed that this vast accumulation of governmental orders, regulations, etc., shall be published in the Register. What a package that is to hand to the taxpayers of the United States. It would be like publishing all outdoors, and the cost is unfathomable.

It is now proposed to codify the accumulation and publish the codification, instead of the text of the orders, regulations, etc., but the amendment proposed to that effect has not been reported out of committee and even the cost of editing and publishing a codification would be staggering and in my opinion wholly unjustifiable.

A WELL-MEANT BUT MISTAKEN EFFORT

The author of the act creating the Federal Register is a friend of mine. I value his friendship highly, and I admire him for his great ability both as a lawyer and as a legislator. I could not, if I desired to do so, challenge the worthiness of his purposes in introducing this legislation. But I believe he is mistaken and that the best interests of the country require that the publication of the Federal Register be terminated forthwith and that no more money be spent uselessly on it.

The theory back of this enterprise was that there is such a multiplicity of governmental orders and regulations that citizens are likely to violate them and thus incur penalties unwittingly because the particular order which they violate has never been brought to their attention.

I think it is a sufficient commentary to say that even if it is the duty of Government to bring such orders to the attention of citizens, which is a direct reversal of the old legal maxim that Ignorantia juris non excusat, the fact remains that it can never be done by publication in the Federal Register. Up to date there are just 69 subscribers to the Federal Register, an inconsequential number among 127,000,000 people.

If these 69 subscribers were yearly subscribers and were to pay the full purchase price of $10 a year each, the total revenue from subscriptions would be $690 a year, as against a charge of $263,320 against the taxpayers, to say nothing of the enormous additional cost if the accumulation of orders is to be printed.

A FLAT PUBLICITY TIRE

It is obvious that with such a limited number of subscribers the Federal Register is going to be a flat tire when it comes to spreading information among the people who might be affected by governmental orders and regulations.

I will venture to say that if a diligent person were to spend an entire day canvassing from door to door, up one street and down another street, or from farmhouse to farmhouse, in any district of any Member of this House, it would be the very rarest exception when he would find any person who had any knowledge whatever of the Federal Register. I believe the answer in at least 99 cases out of 100 would be, "I never heard of it."

In the nature of things this condition will continue as long as the Register is published. It will never make even a dent. It will never serve the purpose intended because the people will never see it. Large business houses probably will see it and find it a convenience and will subscribe for it, but they have their Washington agents to keep them advised in regard to Executive orders and regulations and it is not a justification for its publication to say that it might be some accommodation to them.

A FLOWER OF BUREAUCRACY

This Federal Register does something more which we should not think of doing at the present time by creating a new bureaucratic excrescence to add to our already swollen governmental personnel, known as the Division of the Federal Register, The National Archives. The Director is a presidential appointee and draws a salary of $4,800 a year.

I asked The National Archives to furnish me the present salary set-up of this new addition to the bureaucratic family and I received the following letter in reply:

PLEA FOR MR. COCHRAN'S BILL

On February last our colleague, Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN, of Missouri, introduced a bill to repeal the act creating the Federal Register. In my judgment it is a wise measure and it ought not to die in committee.

I think the Committee on the Judiciary has a duty to report this repealing measure to the House so that we may take it up on the floor, in friendly spirit and with credit to the good intentions of everybody concerned, and let us have a determination and a show-down as to whether, in the judgment of the House, this publication should be continued.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 12 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, a few days ago I charged that the Mexican consul at Laredo was organizing Mexican aliens and Mexican citizens into Mexican labor unions or associations, either under the jurisdiction of or affiliated with the Mexican Government.

The Consul General of Mexico has denied that in a news story and challenged me to give the evidence on which I base the charges.

The issue of the Laredo Times of Sunday, March 15, which is presumably sympathetic with the Mexican Government, has this article—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this speech my colleague is making is a most important one and Members ought to hear it. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-five Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, the article from the Laredo Times, to which I referred, is as follows:

In a meeting presided over by Mexican Consul Juan E. Richer, of Laredo, between 150 and 200 laborers met Friday night at Obreros Hall, where various speakers advocated organization of a labor union to be composed of both alien and naturalized Mexicans in this area.

At this meeting laboring conditions in this country were discussed, and the attitude of President Roosevelt, the immigration department, American business interests, the Laredo Times, and other persons and agencies were severely criticized.

It was decided to continue the meeting Sunday morning at 9 o'clock at Juarez Hall for the purpose of organizing the Confederacion de Obreros Mexico-American y Mexicanos.

The meeting scored the way alien Mexicans are being treated in the United States, particularly in regard to relief.

Consul Richer, as chairman of the meeting, said:

"My object in being here tonight is to unionize all the laboring elements. The Mexican Government is controlling the labor situation very well at the present time. There is no reason why there should be any labor problems here. The laboring class must act and resolve their social conquests.

"I believe you can borrow the columns of Laredo Times in trying to form this association which you plan to organize, for it is very advantageous to all of you. The Laredo Times is always willing to help plans of this nature. It is a newspaper that has always been a friend to the Mexican people and has truthfully presented conditions in Mexico as they have occurred.

"The union is very important, because it is a better way to apply your rights, to better conditions, raise salaries, and there will be more understanding between the people. The doors of the Mexican consulate are always open to you whenever you need assistance."

Joe Jacobs, Laredo photographer, speaker, praised President Cardenas, of Mexico, saying "The only government that is for the laboring class is that of the present regime in Mexico, that of Gen. Lazaro Cardenas."

Jacobs then turned to score the United States Government by continuing: "People have claimed that the President is a great man, but, in truth, he has not done one-tenth of what could be done for the laboring class. He came out with his N. R. A., and the only ones who were benefited were the rich people. There is no need why the Mexican laboring class should be afraid of being deported to Mexico, because the Government has no right to deport them."

Jacobs then paid his respects to the immigration officials of the United States: "Whenever one of these so-called immigration officers, or other officer, call you in the street and tell you that you are wanted in his office you have a right to demand a warrant of arrest. Many people are arrested without warrants, and that is not right. We should organize for the purpose of sending a committee of about 20 or 30 or more to the immigration official that has arrested one of our own. He may get scared, and this committee can report him to Washington, and for that reason he may turn our comrade loose."

Jacobs then scored the Laredo Times as being not in sympathy with the laboring classes and for failure to put labor's side of the question in its news columns. "Take the recent building strike in New York for example. The Times had only short accounts under small headlines", he declared.

MARTINEZ NEXT

Another speaker was Emilio Martinez who admitted he is an alien. He praised Consul Richer for being present and said "up to this time the Mexican consulate has been useless in Laredo."

The speaker then spoke of relief matters in which aliens of Mexico in this country were affected. "Take for example the relief office. Most of the time we are denied relief on the ground that we are Mexican citizens and for that reason they tell us we have no rights at all. We cannot go on living on the present minimum wage standard they have imposed upon us now. We have to do something and that is to organize a union.

"There is only one government in the whole world that is protecting the rights of the laboring class and that is the Government of Gen. Lazaro Cardenas of Mexico", Martinez said.

A man by the name of Cruz made a short speech and said the union strike last year had failed but urged the people to make a second strike and more until their demands were fulfilled.

The other speaker was Maximino Jaurez who told of how a similar organization had been organized in San Antonio as proposed here. This was for all Mexicans, alien and naturalized, to band together to get better wages in this country and to otherwise relieve what he termed were unbearable economic and social conditions.

Mr. MAVERICK. And it was the Mexican Consul who said that?

Mr. DIES. A Mexican Consul presided over this meeting. I am reliably informed that this Consul stated to the meeting that he was acting upon instructions received by him from his Government. I have received letters from American citizens there inquiring why it is possible for a Mexican Consul to be in the United States organizing Mexican aliens and Mexican citizens, to make it possible for them to affiliate with the Mexican labor unions. The following letter is very apropos, coming from a citizen from Laredo, whose name I will not divulge for obvious reasons:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DIES: I am writing to call your attention to some incidents that are being promulgated by aliens in this land of ours. I also will state that all red-blooded Americans, citizens of this part of the State, are in full accord with your immigration bill, and you may rest assured of receiving their loyal support.

May I ask by what right has the Mexican consul (as per Laredo Times I mailed you) here to organize the Mexican alien labor, and that along communistic lines. He says it is "to fight for their rights." Do we not have rights as American citizens? Should not ours be first so considered? Who pays the bill?

Enclosed you will also find some very fine clippings by Lieutenant Colonel Waugh, who gives something worth while. With this and the other in consideration, may I suggest as a further aid to us working people (if such can be done) that all immigration be suspended as well as naturalization to those with more than 2 to 5 years' residence in our country who have made no effort to obtain their papers of citizenship. If this can be done, it will prevent millions of undesirables from taking out papers in order to escape deportation.

Why cannot a law be enacted similar to the labor laws of Mexico whereby they favor their own nationals? Why cannot we have a law giving 90 percent of all labor to our citizens? More than 60 percent of the population in Laredo are Mexican aliens, and they always get preference by many of the employers, for they work them cheaper. Also, these employers stand for seasonal immigration, because they pay from one-half to one-third less, yet it takes bread out of the mouth of the Mexican-American and the American citizen because they cannot work for the price.

We have several hundred aliens who commute daily from Nuevo Laredo and work in our stores. The aliens on this side are on the relief and tell us we have to take care of them. (According to Mr. Russell's article in a recent Saturday Evening Post, 70 percent of our relief are aliens.) Let me see you get anything across the Rio Grande. We have them on jobs from which they are prohibited, but little attention is paid when this is shown the authorities in charge here. Anything you can do will be appreciated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. We have been in session continuously now since January 3. March is almost gone. Why is it the gentleman's bill cannot get action in the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization?

Mr. DIES. Evidently because the committee is not favorable to the bill. That is the reason I put the bill on the Clerk's desk, asking the membership to sign it so that we can get consideration. Another reason is because the House has passed two of my immigration and deportation bills which died in the Senate. Many Members feel like it is futile to continue to pass these bills when they are sidetracked in the other body.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is the only way you ever will get consideration of it here in the House. That requires 218 Members to sign the gentleman's petition, and I hope that they will sign the petition to help us get it out of the committee.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. Yes.

Mr. STUBBS. I have introduced an alien employment bill that will do the very thing that the man who wrote that letter asks. I have also introduced a bill to amend the Immigration Act of 1920, which will do the work that we are after.

Mr. BLANTON. But we are not going to get any bill out of that committee unless the Members of the House take it up in the way of a petition.

Mr. DIES. I call the attention of the House to these further facts, which appear in the Washington Herald of Sunday, February 9, 1936:

Representative Kent H. Redwine, of California, declares that the cost to Los Angeles County alone of unemployed and unemployable aliens is $6,000,000 a year, and he adds that "3,000 Mexicans are being kept on charity rolls only 5 miles north of the border of their own country."

The magazine Today found 3,000 Mexicans on relief in Imperial Valley alone. In Kern County, Calif., there are twice as many Mexicans as all other nationalities, and almost all aliens. In 1933, the California Joint Immigration Commission found 1,000,000 Mexicans living in that State.

It has cost the Government $400,000 to support 2,500 Mexicans in Ray, the Miami-Globe district, and Superior, Ariz., since mines there closed permanently in 1932. They could have been deported for $5 a head, or $12,500.

During the depression of 1921, the Harding administration sent 6,000 Mexicans home from this district, and 40,000 from Arizona as a whole. Now with conditions 10 times as bad, the Government taxes the people of the State to carry this unwanted alien burden.

Half of all relief in Arizona goes to Mexicans. In Laredo, Tex., three-quarters of those on relief were Mexicans.

Mexico has a population of 16,000,000. More than 2,000,000 Mexicans get their living in dollars, in jobs or on relief. No wonder President Cardenas could boast, "No hay depression en Mexico!"

Mr. Speaker, I think the State Department ought to call upon the Mexican Government for an explanation of the fact that a consul of the Mexican Government is in the State of Texas organizing Mexicans, both citizens and aliens, along communistic lines. I want to inquire by what right the Mexican Government comes into the State of Texas or into the State of California or any other State to organize Mexican citizens or Mexican aliens at meetings where speakers criticize the Government of the United States and the manner in which we are administering relief? It is said that aliens are not properly being cared for. There are 1,500,000 aliens on public and private relief in the United States. When they talk about the American Government not being fair to aliens, they fail to take into account that the other countries of the world refuse to permit any of our citizens to be on their relief rolls, and under the laws that exist in these countries American citizens now are not permitted to work anywhere within their borders until the employer who proposes to employ American citizens can prove that he has more jobs than he has native citizens to fill them. That is the law of France, of Germany, of England, of practically every country. The Mexican Government requires 90 percent of all labor on a given job to be native Mexican citizens, and yet that same government, with its communistic leanings, has the audacity to come to the United States and undertake to put into effect the communistic and subversive doctrines and principles they are establishing in the Mexican Republic. [Applause.]

It does seem to me, while I am not in favor of interfering with the internal affairs of Mexico, this is a case where the Mexican representative is taking advantage of our hospitality. President Cardenas, who has been praised so much recently, said, "We have no unemployment problem in Mexico." It is no wonder. We have 2,500,000 Mexican aliens and citizens in the Southwest who are earning their livelihood from jobs that Americans should fill and would fill if we had the same laws they have.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] has expired.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALLGREN. Mr. Speaker, the past week with its devastating floods should awaken Congress to the need of Federal action immediately not only to minimize the losses that might be sustained in the future through a recurrence of a major flood catastrophe but to reduce flood losses that occur regularly in every section of the United States.

It would be foolish to say that all of the loss that has been sustained through floods of the past week could have been prevented. However, there is no question in my mind that had we embarked on a flood-control program a few years ago, the resulting damages would have been minimized to a considerable extent.

The House of Representatives, during the closing hours of the last session, passed a flood-control bill covering projects in every section of the United States. Sponsors of these projects, who are sincere in their desires, were forced to listen to arguments branding the bill as a "pork barrel" measure. Members of Congress from districts affected by floods know the seriousness of the problem, and naturally resent the implications that they are sponsoring projects without merit.

During the debate on this measure it was noticed that provisions were made for the control of floods on streams that had never been brought to the attention of Congress. These same streams today are swollen and breaking their banks to cause great property damage along with the subsequent soil erosion which takes place as the waters subside.

Heretofore the War Department has only considered flood control when incidental to navigation improvement. The Mississippi River and some others have received attention on their flood problems. Now, however, what we need is a comprehensive program which will regulate the floodwaters in many localities.

When cities the size of Pittsburgh are pitched into darkness, when transportation and industry are paralyzed, when lives are lost, when damages run beyond possibility of estimate, when we see disease and pestilence follow in the wake of flood—then, and not till then, do we think of precautionary measures. This Congress must adopt a comprehensive flood-control policy for the protection of lives and property and national resources. No project should be ignored where steps can be taken to prevent such loss.

The President, in his acceptance speech at Chicago, and many times since, has shown his recognition of this problem. Congress, however, has taken a "let George do it" attitude. We have spent billions on projects that cannot measure up in constructive merit with such a program. We have manicured highways, raked leaves, and done other similar work to relieve the distress of the unemployed. Why not spend this money in a more constructive manner? The unemployed are here, the need is here to protect life and property.

The House has done its part in passing last year the $300,000,000 flood-control bill after careful consideration of each project by the Flood Control Committee, of which I am a member. This bill is now before the Senate for consideration.

There has been some question in this past as to whether or not full responsibility for the control of these rivers should be placed upon the Federal Government. The present policy of giving Federal aid to relieve unemployment takes care of that question.

We find today that the War Department through the Corps of Engineers has made 74 miscellaneous flood-control investigations in all parts of the country. On the other hand, we find that only five flood-control projects have been adopted by Congress and that two of these are in Alaska.

This appears to be rather a futile attack on our flood-control program. It seems apparent that some 74 rivers are in need of flood control. How are we going to meet this obviously presented question?

It is my belief that we should work out a plan where the Federal Government would match money in a cooperative effort with the individual States. A plan similar to the one now in effect with our road-building program.

This may be the final solution. However, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that we have passed a bill that now awaits Senate action. Its passage would go a long way toward flood control as well as unemployment relief. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the remarks of Mr. WALLGREN). Mr. Speaker, this flood-control question is so important that I think the absent Members ought to know about it; hence I make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-one Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may have permission to sit during the sessions of the House this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ARMY AIR CORPS AND FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I have just prepared and expect to submit to the House today a unanimous report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill H. R. 11140, to provide more effectively for the national defense by further increasing the effectiveness and efficiency of the Air Corps of the Army of the United States. I ask the Members of this House, Mr. Speaker, to thoroughly examine that report and see the situation that the Army Air Corps is in today. I also ask you to consider something that you will not find in that report, but as you look at the newspaper this morning, on the front page of the Washington Post you will see a picture of a fine young man, a captain in the Army of the United States—Capt. Samuel P. Mills, of the Army Air Corps. On last Friday he started for New Hampshire with my colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], who is now serving his second term as a member of the Flood Control Committee. Captain Mills took the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] to Boston, and on his return yesterday his machine went wrong, he crashed, and was killed. He was only 42 years of age, and he leaves a widow with two children, 10 and 7 years of age.

On the 1st day of this month I went to New Hampshire in an Army plane. It took several hours to get that machine in condition to take off at Bolling Field. This ship in which Captain Mills crashed and was killed I find, after inquiry, to have been an O-38-B observation Douglas plane—a 1931 airplane. Army experts say that when planes get to be 5 years of age they are no good for military purposes; yet today, with only approximately 20 to 25 planes in the Army Air Corps at Bolling Field, we have from 90 to 100 pilots operating those planes. How under heaven, with the best mechanical force in the world, could those machines be kept in proper condition when there are 100 pilots operating a score of planes?

I ask you to have these things in mind when you consider that bill which I am now reporting unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Very briefly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact also that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, with several members of that committee, on their recent trip to the funeral of the late General Mitchell, former Chief of the Army Air Corps, were forced down at Winchester, Va., on account of poor equipment?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. I understand that to be the fact. The Assistant Secretary of War, the Honorable Harry H. Woodring, told a subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on January 16 that under our present policy of appropriations the Army Air Corps will have approximately 777 planes in its possession on July 1 of this year.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. I yield briefly.

Mr. TABER. Is the fault on account of some failure to act on the part of Congress, or is it the fault of the executive personnel of the War Department?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. It was once very largely the fault of the executive personnel of the War Department, but I say to my distinguished friend that we in the Military Affairs Committee believe that we have corrected that fault, and that today the trouble lies in the fact that there are so many in the Air Corps personnel without sufficient machines for them to use, because we do not give them the money with which to get the machines.

Mr. TABER. Why?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Because the Congress has long failed to appropriate sufficient funds with which to get the machines.

Mr. TABER. Why, if my colleague will yield further, if the executive end is what it should be, should they allow planes to go out that are not in proper condition?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Because planes 5 years old are supposed to be fit to run, but not for military purposes; and as I say we see in a condition like this, with planes 4 or 5 years old, a demonstration that they are not only unfit for military purpose but are not fit to be used at all with reasonable assurance of safety. The sooner we give them money to get new planes which can be safely used the sooner we will begin saving the lives of American citizens.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. BLANTON. From Hawaii last September my committee sent a telegram to the Public Works Administration calling attention to the fact that the terrain at Luke Field was so rough to all Army planes landing there that it was costing us $120,000 a year in damage to planes alone, not considering human life. We asked the Administrator to allot money there to put proper all-weather aprons down, and stop this great damage and menace to human life, but not a single dollar did he allot. Instead he spent it here for tin-can starling-scaring operations in Washington.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield further. I have just started on this proposition. I will discuss it more fully on the bill, which I am about to report, and for which we ask your support to provide sufficient new planes for the Army Air Corps.

There were two matters which I desired to present to you this morning briefly; one is the problem of national defense, as reflected in the Army Air Corps, and the other is national flood control. This plane in which Captain Mills was killed was sent north—and I think perhaps under the circumstances of the desire of my colleague from New Hampshire to get home, they perhaps would send out a plane that under some circumstances would not have been permitted to leave the ground; but even so, this poor pilot is dead.

Coming now to flood control, what happened not only throughout New England, but in many other States of the Nation? We find millions of dollars of wreckage in the city of Manchester and State of New Hampshire. The largest textile plant in the country is wrecked and washed out, bridges are gone, mills are gone, houses, stores, and schools are gone because of the ravages of the Merrimack River throughout the State of New Hampshire.

Over a year ago, on February 27, 1935, I introduced a bill in this House known as H. R. 6233 to provide for flood control of the Merrimack River. My law office is on the shore of the Merrimack. I know the conditions of this river; and when my attention was called to the report made to the Secretary of War, Patrick J. Hurley, back in 1930, by the Office of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, I knew then how much chance I stood to get any favorable action on that bill. Let me show you, Mr. Speaker, how things are done in situations of this kind. Here is the Merrimack going over its banks through New England, destroying millions of dollars' worth of property with homes, mills, bridges, and highways complete washouts; yet in 1927 we had a flood there and an inspection was made by the Office of the Chief of Army Engineers in 1927, and report submitted in 1930, known as House Document No. 308 of the Sixty-ninth Congress. What is said of the Merrimack River? I will read extracts from it to you:

The Merrimack River has its source in central New Hampshire, flows south into Massachusetts, and thence east through the northeastern corner of that State, and enters the Atlantic Ocean at Newburyport, Mass.

Floods of a damaging nature are rare, the river overflowing its banks only about once in 20 years. The unusual flood of 1927 was the most destructive of record, the damages being estimated at $2,365,000.

Bearing in mind the millions of dollars of damage done there at this time I call your attention to the following:

The Merrimack River, the fourth largest stream in New England, begins at Franklin, N. H., and is formed by the junction of the Pemigewasset and Winnepesaukee Rivers. The former rises in the White Mountains, where the headwaters elevation is about 2,000 feet, and the latter is the outlet of the Winnepesaukee Lake system. From Franklin the Merrimack flows south through New Hampshire for about 65 miles to the northern boundary of Massachusetts, where it turns abruptly to the east and flows parallel to this boundary and a few miles distant from it until it reaches tide-water about 2 miles above Haverhill.

Now I come to the important part of this document which we are asked to consider. I ask you to give it your conscientious and careful attention:

The disastrous flood of November 1927, due to the mutual interference of two storms, seems to have been without parallel in the records of western New England as regards rapid precipitation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. I continue reading from this report, and ask your careful attention to the following:

The investigation has gone far enough to indicate that on a basis of the limited data available a similar rainfall may not happen on an average oftener than once in 500 years, and under certain assumptions not oftener than once in 1,000 years.

This is the type of report we got from the Army engineers after their examination of the river. We who live near it know it overflows and that such a statement cannot be based on accurate information; and the proof of it is what we see in the papers this morning and what we saw in the papers last week.

The Chief of Engineers of the Army further said:

The probabilities for an extreme flood throughout the whole valley appear, therefore, to be remote.

May I say that, knowing the conditions elsewhere and appreciating the language employed in this report, I asked the Chief of Engineers to have another survey and another report made and received a promise from him that such a survey and report would be made. In the face of conditions now existing in New Hampshire and New England, Mr. Speaker, I do not fear what that report will be. May I ask that we work together for a system here that will provide for examination of all these flood areas and that the Federal Government cooperate with the States in order to prevent such future damage?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include certain parts of a small article which appeared in the New York Times of Sunday, March 22, by Senator ROBERT F. WAGNER, with reference to this flood-control situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

By ROBERT F. WAGNER, Senator from New York

WASHINGTON, March 21.—The floods now devastating the country lend a costly and tragic emphasis to the need for Federal flood control. While our first thought naturally is to relieve the suffering and distress of the emergency, there must be no delay in effecting a coordinated system of flood control for the Nation.

Floods pay no attention to jurisdiction. They are no respecters of States' rights. Nor do they consider the capacity to pay of the man whose house or factory they invade.

This problem of flood control has the compelling insistence of emergency. Not because of the present disaster—that horse is stolen from the barn—but because, until adequate control works are constructed, these many areas are danger zones and a large number of our people are in jeopardy.

The agency to meet an emergency, where there is any question of responsibility, should be selected on the basis of efficiency. Where the physical problem transcends the boundaries of local governments or States the Federal Government stands as the logical agent.

In flood control the interstate course of the water combines with the interstate scope of the damage done, through the halting of public services and the interruption of traffic and communication, to invoke Federal action. This is strikingly illustrated today in the Pittsburgh tie-up.

HELD A PUBLIC-WELFARE NEED

Because of the multiple uses of water, for power, for transportation, for industry, for sanitation, and consumption, and because of the complex and far-reaching results when its control is neglected, the public welfare demands that this problem be promptly and comprehensively met.

In practice and by the terms of the Constitution, the Federal Government is accountable for the general welfare. It is also true that Federal action in this matter requires full cooperation on the part of the States and local governments.

New forms of regional agencies are being tried to achieve this coordination—the New England Council, the Ohio River Board of Health, the Port of New York Authority. Flood-control problems vary with the physical, social, and economic characters of the regions affected, and methods of achieving Federal, State, and interstate cooperation may be suited to the special problems involved. The principle remains, however, that the Federal Government should act.

Now is the acceptable time. Much has already been done in engineers' surveys, in planning, and in P. W. A., where, as of January 1, 1936, $12,176,533 has been granted to projects aimed at flood control. The Mississippi River and its tributaries have long been the object of Federal flood-control efforts.

Planned national conservation is the stitch in time. Money spent now on public works, even if the Government must borrow and pay interest thereon, will earn for the citizens of the country freedom from these sudden and devastating losses. In a few tragic days many times the cost of control works can be washed from the taxpayers' pockets and swept downstream.

RELIEF ANGLE CALLED TIMELY

Conservation is making steady progress as our approved public policy. Now its extension to water in the form of flood control should be given the attention of the American people, who already heartily endorse the forest and wildlife conservation activities of the Government.

Flood control is not relief, not a temporary means of providing employment, not the rebuilding of destroyed public works. It is the construction and maintenance of certain works, dams, levees, channel improvements, and reservoirs, according to plans which consider the ultimate maximum development of the affected areas, their waters, and their lands, for the benefit of their people, present and future.

Indirectly, of course, such works do provide employment and consume materials, which is not to be overlooked in these times. These works will provide relief, relief from the danger of repetition of the present disaster.

But it cannot be too plainly stated that the Federal program of flood control which I am urging is no temporary expedient, no stopgap, but a most proper action of the Federal Government in meeting its responsibilities to the American people. With the experience of the past, the sad emphasis of the present catastrophe, and the avowed interest of the administration in public works, surely now is the time to adopt a comprehensive program of flood control for the Nation.

WHY THE 10-PERCENT-PROFITS LIMITATION AMENDMENT SHOULD REMAIN IN THE WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include some statistics and data with regard to aircraft construction and our system of procurement at the present time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House, I am sure, have listened with much interest to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ROGERS] and his description of the unfortunate accident that occurred yesterday in the crash of Capt. Samuel P. Mills on his return from Boston to Washington in an Army plane.

We should not, however, become confused by these continuous crashes of Army planes. We remember these crashes occurred regularly when the Army made a feeble effort to carry the air mail, and unfortunately they have continued since then. We should look carefully to the cause of these crashes and then remedy the cause if we are to be able to stop so many unfortunate accidents. The cause of these crashes is due largely to faulty equipment and faulty procurement methods in securing this equipment.

TEN-PERCENT-PROFITS LIMITATION AMENDMENT

The Senate today has just voted to take out of the House War Department appropriation bill, H. R. 11035, the 10-percent-profits limitation amendment unanimously inserted in this bill on the floor of the House on February 14 while this bill was being considered in the House. The principle reason urged for the elimination of this amendment is that we already have keen competition in our procurement methods of aircraft and that further limitation of profits would jeopardize our aircraft-procurement method. The best answer to these statements is to look at the record and see what it shows.

NINETY-TWO PERCENT OF AIRCRAFT PURCHASED WITHOUT COMPETITION

According to the contracts on file in the Comptroller's office, of both Army and Navy for all aircraft and accessories purchased from 1926 to 1934, the Comptroller's records show that 92 percent of these contracts on file in his office were let without competitive bids. The Army covering this period purchased $57,346,098, of which $3,336,664 was purchased with competitive bidding, or 92 percent purchased without competitive bidding. The Navy purchased $53,026,614, of which $5,901,051 was purchased through competitive bidding, or 91.3 percent of the Navy's aircraft equipment was purchased without competitive bidding.

The decisions by the Judge Advocate General's Departments of both Army and the Navy since the Aircraft Act of 1926 became effective to date have continuously held that section 10K of this act, through which most of the violations occur, requires competition in procurement, yet the procurement division has almost continuously disregarded the aircraft law on procurement. From July 1926 through December 1933 the Army bought 4,245 engines and 1,857 planes. According to the Comptroller's office, only two of these engines were purchased through proper competitive methods. Covering the same period, the Navy bought 3,158 engines, 103 through competition, and 1,076 airplanes; of this 4,245 engines purchased by the Army 2,492 were bought from the Pratt & Whitney Co., 1,740 from Wright Aeronautical, and only 13 engines from all other engine manufacturers in the United States. The Navy purchased 2,149 engines from Pratt & Whitney Co., 973 from Wright Aeronautical, and 36 from all others. In all fairness to both the Army and the Navy, since our investigations and reports were made it may be said that since December 1933 both Departments have purchased a few engines from others than the two principal engine-manufacturing concerns of the United States as above shown.

THE PROCUREMENT LAW

So that you may understand the procurement methods involved, and how the War Department is violating same let me quote the law, then the testimony of the Department officials, and then the decisions of the Comptroller's Department showing violation of the law.

The Aircraft Act of 1926, which has been repeatedly violated since its enactment on procurement, reads as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) That in order to encourage the development of aviation and improve the efficiency of the Army and Navy aeronautical matériel the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, prior to the procurement of new designs of aircraft, or aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, shall, by advertisement for a period of 30 days in at least three of the leading aeronautical journals and in such other manner as he may deem advisable, invite the submission in competition, by sealed communications, of such designs of aircraft, aircraft parts, and aeronautical accessories, together with a statement of the price for which such designs in whole or in part will be sold to the Government.

(b) The aforesaid advertisement shall specify a sufficient time, not less than 60 days from the expiration of the advertising period, within which all such communications containing designs and prices therefor must be submitted, and all such communications received shall be carefully kept sealed in the War Department or the Navy Department, as the case may be, until the expiration of said specified time, and no designs mailed after that time shall be received or considered. Said advertisement shall state in general terms the kind of aircraft, parts, or accessories to be developed and the approximate number or quantity required, and the Department concerned shall furnish to each applicant identical specific detailed information as to the conditions and requirements of the competition and as to the various features and characteristics to be developed, listing specifically the respective measures of merit, expressed in rates per centum, that shall be applied in determining the merits of the designs, and said measures of merit shall be adhered to throughout such competition. All designs received up to the time specified for submitting them shall then be referred to a board appointed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Department concerned and shall be appraised by it as soon as practicable and report made to the Secretary as to the winner or winners of such competition. When said Secretary shall have approved the report of said board, he shall then fix a time and place for a public announcement of the results and notify each competitor thereof; but if said report shall be disapproved by said Secretary, the papers shall be returned to the board for revision or the competition be decided by the Secretary, in his discretion, and in any case the decision of the Secretary shall be final and conclusive. Such announcement shall include the percentages awarded to each of the several features or characteristics of the designs submitted by each competitor and the prices named by the competitors for their designs and the several features thereof if separable.

(c) Thereupon the said Secretary is authorized to contract with the winner or winners in such competition on such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the Government for furnishing or constructing all of each of the items, or all of any one or more of the several items of the aircraft, or parts, or accessories indicated in the advertisement, as the said Secretary shall find that in his judgment a winner is, or can within a reasonable time become, able and equipped to furnish or construct satisfactorily all or part, provided said Secretary and the winner shall be able to agree on a reasonable price. If the Secretary shall decide that a winner cannot reasonably carry out and perform a contract for all or part of such aircraft, parts, or accessories, as above provided, then he is authorized to purchase the winning designs or any separable parts thereof if a fair and reasonable price can be agreed on with the winner, but not in excess of the price submitted with the designs.

(d) After contract is made, as authorized by any provision of this section, with a winner in such design competition for furnishing or constructing aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories in accordance with his designs and payment is completed under said contract, and after the purchase of and payment for the designs or separable parts thereof of a winner, as authorized herein, with whom a contract shall not have been made for furnishing or constructing aircraft, aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories in accordance with his designs, then in either case any department of the Government shall have the right without further compensation to the winner to construct or have constructed according to said designs and use any number of aircraft or parts or accessories, and sell said aircraft or parts or accessories according to law as condemned material: Provided, That such winner shall, nevertheless, be at liberty to apply for a patent on any features originated by him, and shall be entitled to enjoy the exclusive rights under such patent as he may obtain as against all other persons except the United States Government or its assignee as aforesaid.

(e) The competitors in design competition mentioned in this section shall submit with their designs a graduated scale of prices for which they are willing to construct any or all or each of the aircraft, aircraft parts, and aeronautical accessories for which designs are submitted, and such stated prices shall not be exceeded in the awarding of contracts contemplated by this section.

(f) If the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy shall find that in his judgment none of the designs submitted in said competition is of sufficient merit to justify the procurement of aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories in accordance therewith, then he shall not be obligated to accept any of such designs or to make any payment on account of any of them. If the Secretary of the Department concerned shall decide that the designs submitted by two or more competitors possess equal merit or that certain features embodied in the designs of any competitor are superior to corresponding features embodied in the designs of any other competitor and such features of one design may be substituted in another design, the said Secretary shall in his discretion divide the contracts for furnishing and manufacturing the aircraft, parts, or accessories required equitably among those competitors that have submitted designs of equal merit, or he may select and combine features of superior excellence in different designs in such manner as may in his judgment best serve the Government's interests and make payment accordingly to the several competitors concerned at fair and reasonable prices, awarding the contract for furnishing or constructing the aircraft, parts, or accessories to the competitor or competitors concerned that have the highest figures of merit in said competition.

(g) In case the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy shall be unable to make contract as above authorized with a winner in said completion for furnishing or constructing aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories covered by the whole or part of the designs of such winner, or shall be unable to agree with a winner in the competition on a reasonable purchase price for the design of such winner with whom a contract may not be made, as aforesaid, he may retain such designs and shall advertise according to law for proposals for furnishing or constructing aircraft, or parts or accessories, in accordance with such designs or combinations thereof as aforesaid and, after all proposals are submitted, make contract on such terms and conditions as he may consider the best in the Government's interests, with the bidder that he shall find to be the lowest responsible bidder for furnishing or constructing the aircraft, parts, or accessories required, but the said Secretary shall have the right to reject all bids and to advertise for other bids with such other and different specifications as he may deem proper.

(h) If within 10 days after the announcement of the results of said competition any participant in the competition shall make to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy a reasonable showing in writing that error was made in determining the merits of designs submitted whereby such claimant was unjustly deprived of an award, the matter shall at once be referred by the Secretary of the department concerned to a board of arbitration for determination and the finding of such board shall, with the approval of the said Secretary, be conclusive on both parties. Such board of arbitration shall be composed of three skilled aeronautical engineers, one selected by the said Secretary, one by the claimant, and the third by those two, no one of whom shall have been a member of the board of appraisal in that competition.

(i) Any person, firm, or corporation that shall complain that his, their, or its designs hereafter developed relating to aircraft or any components thereof are used or manufactured by or for any department of the Government without just compensation from either the Government, or any other source, may within 4 years from the date of such use file suit in the Court of Claims for the recovery of his reasonable and entire compensation for such use and manufacture after the date of this act.

(j) Only citizens of the United States, and corporations of which not less than three-fourths of the capital stock is owned by citizens of the United States, and of which the members of the boards of directors are citizens of the United States, and having manufacturing plants located within the continental limits of the United States shall be eligible to be awarded any contract under this section to furnish or construct aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories for the United States Government, except that a domestic corporation whose stock shall be listed on a stock exchange shall not be barred by the provisions of this section unless and until foreign ownership or control of a majority of its stock shall be known to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, and no aliens employed by a contractor for furnishing or constructing aircraft, or aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories for the United States shall be permitted to have access to the plans or specifications or the work under construction or to participate in the contract trials without the written consent beforehand of the Secretary of the Department concerned.

(k) The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy may at his discretion purchase abroad or in the United States with or without competition, by contract, or otherwise, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories of the best kind for the Army or the Navy, as the case may be, and if as a result of such procurement new and suitable designs considered to be the best kind for the Army or the Navy are developed, he may enter into contract, subject to the requirements of paragraph (j) of this section, for the procurement in quantity of such aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (e), inclusive, hereof.

(l) The manufacturing plant, and books, of any contractor for furnishing or constructing aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories for the War Department or the Navy Department, or such part of any manufacturing plant as may be so engaged, shall at all times be subject to inspection and audit by any person designated by the head of any executive department of the Government.

(m) All audits and reports of inspection, made under the provisions of this section, shall be preserved by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, for a period of 10 years, and shall be subject to inspection by any committee of Congress, and the said Secretaries shall annually make a detailed and itemized report to Congress of all the departments' operations under this section, the names and addresses of all competitors, and of all persons having been awarded contracts and the prices paid for aircraft purchased and the grounds and reasons for having awarded such contracts to the particular persons, firms, or corporations, and all such reports shall be printed and held subject to public distribution.

(n) Every vendor of designs to the War Department or the Navy Department under the provisions of this section, and every contractor for furnishing or constructing for the War Department or the Navy Department, or both, aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories, shall deliver to the Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy, or both, when required by either or both, a release in such form and containing such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or both, of claims on the part of such vendor or contractor against the United States arising out of such sale or contract, or both.

(o) All or any appropriations available for the procurement of aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, for the War Department or the Navy Department shall also be available for payment of the purchase price of designs and the costs of arbitration as authorized by this section.

(p) Any collusion, understanding, or arrangement to deprive the United States Government of the benefit of full and free competition in any competition authorized by this section, or to deprive the United States Government of the benefit of a full and free audit of the books of any person, firm, or corporation engaged in carrying out any contract authorized by this section, so far as may be necessary to disclose the exact cost of executing such contract, shall be unlawful, and any person, firm, or corporation that shall, upon indictment and trial, be found guilty of violating any of the provisions of this section shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not exceeding $20,000 or to be imprisoned not exceeding 5 years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

(q) In the procurement of aircraft constructed according to designs presented by any individual, firm, or corporation prior to the passage of this act, which designs have been reduced to practice and found to be suitable for the purpose intended, or according to such designs with minor modifications thereof, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, when in his opinion the interests of the United States will be best served thereby, may contract with said individual, firm, or corporation at reasonable prices for such quantities of said aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as he may deem necessary: Provided, That the action of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy in each such case shall be final and conclusive.

(r) A board to be known as the patents and design board is hereby created, the three members of which shall be an Assistant Secretary of War, an Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and an Assistant Secretary of Commerce. To this board any individual, firm, or corporation may submit a design for aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, and, whether patented or unpatentable, the said board, upon the recommendation of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, shall determine whether the use of such designs by the Government is desirable or necessary, and evaluate the designs so submitted and fix the worth to the United States of said design, not to exceed $75,000. The said designer, individual, firm, or corporation may then be offered the sum fixed by the board for the ownership or a non-exclusive right of the United States to the use of the design in aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, and upon the acceptance thereof shall execute complete assignment or nonexclusive license to the United States: Provided, That no sum in excess of $75,000 shall be paid for any one design.

(s) The terms "winner" or "winners" as used in this section shall be construed to include not more than three competitors having the highest figures of merit in any one competition.

(t) Hereafter whenever the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy shall enter into a contract for or on behalf of the United States for aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories, said Secretary is hereby authorized to award such contract to the bidder that said Secretary shall find to be the lowest responsible bidder that can satisfactorily perform the work or the service required to the best advantage of the Government; and the decision of the Secretary of the Department concerned as to the award of such contract, the interpretation of the provisions of the contract, and the application and administration of the contract shall not be reviewable, otherwise than as may be therein provided for, by any officer or tribunal of the United States except the President and the Federal courts.

You will note from reading the above law that sections 10a to 10e accurately provide open competition in procurement of new designs of aircraft and accessories through advertisement in aeronautical journals for a period of not less than 30 days. It provides further methods of purchase and payment by the Government for such designs through competition. Section k provides how the Government may purchase for experimental purposes such aircraft, and so forth, if necessary. This section has been one of the most controversial of the entire Aircraft Act because of the large number of purchases and large amounts of such purchases made for experimental purposes. Then, under section q, all aircraft concerns having patents on same which they can show were reduced to practice and found suitable prior to July 2, 1926, when the Aircraft Act became effective, have a governmental patent monopoly; and no one, of course, can compete with them on their products. Under section t, which usually works closely in connection to section k—after the experimental stage is supposed to have passed—the Secretary of War or Navy are allowed to purchase such aircraft or accessories in quantity lots from what they term the lowest responsible bidder, and the decisions of each Secretary for the Department is final. Time has sworn that section t has been the most important section of the Aircraft Act insofar as change and procurement methods are concerned, for it has taken out from under the Comptroller's office the right to finally pass upon the legality of all such contracts and has turned over to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy the final right to say whether or not the provisions of the contract have been complied with.

The fears of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who vigorously opposed this section in 1926 when the bill was enacted, have been proved well founded, for these two Departments, as shown from the records above quoted, have had very little regard for careful competition in aircraft procurement.

GENERAL CRAIG AND ASSISTANT SECRETARY WOODRING TESTIFY

In the hearings before the Senate Appropriations Committee on March 3, 1936, in testifying against the 10-percent profits limitations this colloquy occurred:

Senator COPELAND. Have you any objection to the provision as carried in the Navy bill, the same language that is in the Navy bill; is the same language that is in the Navy bill satisfactory to you here, or would that be satisfactory?

General CRAIG. I personally do not think so, sir, because the Navy has a totally different problem from us; a totally different problem from us, and they at present are unable to state whether or not it is satisfactory to them. . . .

The proposed section would stifle research and development in the industry insofar as military airplanes are concerned. At present the War Department system places research and development squarely on the shoulders of the industry, where we think it belongs. . . .

It may starve the industry for the reason that if an aircraft corporation is always to be limited to an absolute maximum of profit on a contract, it has no means of recouping the losses which it inevitably takes on some contracts, particularly those of an experimental nature. This might tend to wreck the smaller firms and put all the business into the hands of a few strong ones. If the industry is crippled, the Government would have to go into business. . . .

Section 10 of the act approved July 2, 1926, provides a most careful system of procurement of aircraft. The War Department's auditors go carefully into every cost before a contract is awarded, and are in the factory during the life of the contract. The Department is zealous in its administration. To complicate it by adopting further law without mature consideration is highly dangerous to national defense. . . .

The administration of this provision will be very expensive. Our auditing force would have to be greatly increased and would require greatly increased travel and per-diem allowance. Much of economy sought might be eaten up this way.

Thus we find General Craig opposed to 10-percent excess-profits limitation because: First, it would stifle research and development; second, it would starve industry, and thus force the Government into business; third, the War Department already has auditors who carefully check every cost in every contract; and, fourth, limiting the profit to 10 percent would tremendously increase the auditing force to check such contracts. We find Mr. Woodring testified as follows:

In looking up the law some 2 years ago I found that we were not carrying out the law, the Defense Aircraft Act of 1926, in the method in which we were procuring our aircraft, and as you know—you have heard a lot about it—we changed from a negotiated contract to a competitive bidding basis, which I think conscientious opinion holds is according to law.

The second thing that I have in mind was that we would, in changing to a competitive method of procurement, that we would transfer from the Government bureau, from a Government bureau, and Government civil service, and Army men, at Wright Field, we would transfer from them the development in engineering, designing, and possibly construction of airplanes over to industry, where I think it rightfully belongs.

I am against the Government being in business, in the manufacture of any of this business, especially of airplanes. The competitive method of doing business puts the responsibility of design and progress of military aircraft in the hands of the industry. . . .

The second phase of my change was to put this procurement responsibility and the progress of military aviation upon industry.

Further, in explanation of the procurement policy installed, Mr. Woodring said:

The House Military Affairs Committee have conducted a detailed investigation into Army aircraft procurement over this same period and my office in collaboration with this committee have worked out a policy of procurement which has been in effect some 20 months and is definitely producing the desired results.

. . . . Now the system is becoming effective, and this year we will have over 500 modern airplanes delivered, and they, I want to say to you, are the finest airplanes that any country has in military aviation. I believe they are 2 years in advance, in progress, of any other military arm of government.

So that now Mr. Woodring describes his procurement system built up as follows:

The bidder is required to submit with his bid a completed airplane on the line for test, as he submits his bid, and these airplanes are thoroughly tested and contracts awarded to the manufacturer who has produced the finest performing airplane, after we have evaluated all the planes in competition.

To insure the reasonableness of the cost a careful financial audit is made of the cost figures of the manufacturer, after we make an award. This policy is resulting in a constant striving on the part of the manufacturers to offer better and better performing aircraft. It places squarely on the shoulders of industry, where it logically belongs, the necessary research and development work and gives the Government the active use and benefit of all the brains of the industry.

For instance, we will send out invitations for bombers for delivery in 10 or 12 months, and probably 3 different concerns scattered well over the United States to bid on bombers. Certainly under that kind of a system the companies are going, with their engineering and designing and researching departments, are going to try and build, develop and build, and deliver on the line the finest bomber in order to win the competition and therefore get the business.

And further commenting upon his record of procurement built up, he says:

Assistant Secretary WOODRING. I think that I could elaborate more on that by saying that in this connection there have been many statements made in the past few years ago as to the relative performance ability of military aircraft produced in this country and those of foreign countries.

Unbiased reports indicate very definitely that the airplanes now being obtained for the Army Air Corps are the finest being produced anywhere in the world.

While I hope this is true, the latest information I have comparing our war-plane aircraft with other European war-plane aircraft I find our performance and position in the different classifications have not materially changed from the aircraft charts shown on pages 10034 to 10064, Seventy-third Congress, second session, comparing practically every known war-plane engine and their latest known performance in the world. These charts showed up much weaker than several other countries in all the different kinds of war planes but bombers.

When the Army or Navy desire to carry on any research or experimental work under the above-quoted law they advertise for open design competition and for such experimental work. The Congress the last 10 years has made the following appropriations for the Navy:

Fiscal year:	Amount
1926	$1,674,277
1927	1,664,364
1928	1,640,844
1929	1,966,113
1930	1,807,034
1931	1,991,092
1932	2,107,971
1933	1,985,975
1934	2,197,558
1935	1,820,597
1936 (to Mar. 16, 1936)	1,591,827
Total	20,447,652

And, as said by the Navy Department:

The bulk of these funds is spent for experimental aircraft, from which are selected sample or prototype airplanes around which the specifications are drawn for quantity contracts for aircraft to be used for equipping operating squadrons.

WAR DEPARTMENT EXPERIMENTAL WORK

We find the War Department spent for experimental and development work in 1935, $4,541,799; in 1936, $4,865,293; and for previous years back to 1926 similar amounts. So, contrary to the above-quoted testimony, it seems that under the law ample appropriations have been made annually to carry on such experimental and development work at the expense of the Government, and such moneys have been so expended annually and industry has not been called upon to carry this experimental and development work. Under the law, section 10a to 10e, it is the duty of the Government to pay for such experimental and development work, and the appropriations show how well the Government has paid. In answer to Mr. Woodring's testimony as to the kind and character of procurement had in the Air Corps, let me quote from the report of the subcommittee of the House Military Affairs Committee in 1934 the testimony of Brigadier General Westover, now Chief of the Air Corps, who testified regarding the then system of aircraft procurement, corroborating General Foullois' testimony:

This testimony was corroborated by the evidence of Brigadier General Westover, who testified in part as follows:

"Mr. ROGERS. Was it the intention of the Air Corps at that time to purchase by competitive bidding or negotiated contract?"

"General WESTOVER. It was the intention to purchase by negotiated contract and recommendations.

"Mr. ROGERS. That being in accordance with the usual practice?"

"General WESTOVER. That being in accordance with the practice that had existed since about 1927 or 1928, when the Air Corps Act of 1926 was actually put in practice.

"Mr. ROGERS. That was in accordance with the understanding of the meaning of the Air Corps Act of 1926?"

"General WESTOVER. I have studied the Air Corps Act quite frequently, and I have never had any reservations about concluding that the negotiated contracts were entirely within the law and probably intended by that act.

"Mr. JAMES. Have you ever read any decision of the Judge Advocate General?"

"General WESTOVER. I have.

"Mr. JAMES. Do you see any that corroborate your view?"

"General WESTOVER. No, sir.

"Mr. JAMES. Do you see others that were the exact opposite of what you state?"

"General WESTOVER. I have, sir.

"Mr. JAMES. All you have seen have been the decisions of the Judge Advocate General stating that what you were doing was in violation of the law; isn't that true?"

"General WESTOVER. I believe that is right.

"Mr. JAMES. As a sworn officer of the Government, you know that the Judge Advocate General has ruled that you can't purchase planes in quantity under (k) don't you?"

"General WESTOVER. I have understood that decision; yes, sir.

"Mr. JAMES. You know that is so, don't you?"

"General WESTOVER. I don't get your point, Mr. James?

"Mr. JAMES. You know that the Judge Advocate General has rendered a decision that you cannot purchase planes in quantity under (k), don't you?"

"General WESTOVER. I know that; yes, sir."

On being further pressed as to whether or not he had approved contracts for purchases under section 10 (k), Brigadier General Westover stated that he had approved no contracts, that he had nothing to do with the approval of contracts, and that "when and if it becomes my duty to approve those I will be fully informed. I am talking about my casual knowledge at the present time."

Realizing on reflection that the testimony so given was contrary to the documentary evidence available to the committee, Brigadier General Westover, by letter dated April 9, 1934, wrote this subcommittee as follows:

"With reference to corrected testimony on page 451 to the effect that 'I have never approved any contracts for aircraft', it should be understood that at times, as Acting Chief of the Air Corps in the absence of General Foullois, it becomes my duty to recommend to The Assistant Secretary of War approval or disapproval of contracts in accordance with established procedure and the policy of the Chief of the Air Corps. . . ."

An inspection of the chart of purchases annexed to this report and marked "Exhibit A" will disclose the many instances in which Brigadier General Westover approved contracts for the procurement of aircraft and accessories and the value thereof.

It should be noted here that in the purchase of Army airplanes no performance guaranty whatsoever other than weight and balance is required from the successful vendor, a deplorable condition which would not be tolerated in private industry and which is not permitted in other branches of our National Government.

But Mr. Woodring now says within the last 20 months they have agreed to correct this. Let us see if he has done so.

M'CARL SAYS NO COMPETITION

On February 19, 1936, Hon. J. R. McCarl, Comptroller, wrote the Secretary of the Navy fully, in answer to his report of December 16, 1935, as to why the Douglas Aircraft Co. had been given a contract for 20 airplanes on a bid of $49,500 when all three other bidders were much lower. In this letter the Comptroller General said:

The abstract of bids shows that the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., which received the award for the delivery of 20 airplanes, submitted a bid of $49,500 each for the skeleton airplanes; the Curtiss-Wright Airplane Co. submitted a bid of $29,500 each; the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation submitted a bid of $29,150 each; and the Bellanca Aircraft Co. submitted a bid of $17,424 each. That is to say, the bid of the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., for $49,500 was more than $20,000 each in excess of the bids submitted by the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation and by the Curtiss-Wright Airplane Co. for delivery of airplanes within the specifications as advertised. You report that the bid of the Bellanca Aircraft Co. was not considered because of failure to supply an airplane for tests.

There was no competition with respect to price, and as hereinbefore stated there was a difference of approximately $20,000 per plane, or $400,000 for the 20 planes contracted for (about 94 percent), between the offering by the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., which was accepted, and that by the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation, yet the offering of the latter far exceeded the minimum requirements of the specifications.

The plan having provided no method of translating difference in "figures of merit" into terms of money, it would have been possible thereunder for the Douglas Aircraft Co., Inc., or other bidder, whose offering exceeded only to the extent of a few "points" the offerings by competitors, to have obtained an award even though its bid exceeded even in greater amount the bids of competitors than the approximately 94 percent actually appearing here.

There can be no proper evaluation of offerings, except perchance in certain design competitions, where price is totally disregarded and comparison is solely on the basis of design, construction, and performance. Obviously uses of public moneys appropriated for defense would not be justified in paying an amount possibly three or four times actual value, and much in excess of a bid offering an airplane far exceeding the minimum requirements, just because the offering of the high bid outscored the offering of the lower bidder by a few points—and this perchance, with respect to elements not necessarily of the exact value or importance accorded in the evaluation table.

In the instant matter while it was stated in the request for bids that award would be made under subparagraph (t) of section 10 of the act of July 2, 1926, which subparagraph is applicable to awards for quantity production of particular designs theretofore determined pursuant to law to be best for the needs of the United States, the plan specified for determining the offering to receive the award clearly discloses that no particular design had been so determined to be best for the needs of the United States in that such competition as there was in the matter went only to such elements as design, construction, and performance—competition as to price was wholly lacking.

As has several times been stated by this office in decisions to both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with respect to uses of appropriations under the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 788), the law contemplates that there be design competition for the purpose of determining the airplanes best suited for the needs of the United States, and that after it has been so determined what designs of airplanes are best suited for the needs of the United States there shall be advertising, on the basis of such designs, for quantity production, with award under subparagraph (t) of section 10 of said act. While the War Department has contended for other procedures and has operated in such manner as to make it difficult for the accounting officers of the Government to give reasonable effect to the law as so interpreted by decisions as to the legal availability of the appropriations involved, and yet avoid drawing the lines too sharply on administrative effort, and there have been numerous and extended investigations and hearings by committees of the Congress, yet the law as so interpreted has remained unchanged and the instant transaction was had in the light thereof. In such circumstances the accounting officers may not properly, and without limit, continue to overcome the effects of faulty administration by setting up safeguards around particular transactions, apparently sufficient in the circumstances to protect the Treasury. Then, too, bidders have interests that are for respecting.

The procedure was not as authorized by the act of July 2, 1926, supra, for quantity production and so as to obligate the appropriation proposed to be utilized accordingly, and while it has characteristics of a design competition, as provided for by said act, such a competition does not contemplate purchase of 20 airplanes, as was contracted for, but rather 1 or possibly 2—with advertising for quantity production after there has thus been determined the particular airplane best suited to the needs of the United States.

In view of all the circumstances appearing, however, including the appearance of some improvement in administrative methods, it may be stated that if there exists such serious need for early delivery and use as to negative in the public interest cancellation of the contract and advertising for quantity production of such airplane as has been determined to be best suited to the needs of the United States, as contemplated by the act of July 2, 1926, supra, and such facts are made of record here, it would seem this office might be justified in withholding objection to uses of the appropriation in making payments—but only to the extent of established reasonable and necessary costs to contractors in manufacturing the airplanes as contracted for, plus reasonable profit—and within the price as stated in the contract. This, of course, because of total lack of competition as to price and the wide difference between the amount of the high bid, accepted, and the lower bids offering airplanes showing merit far in excess of the minimum requirements, and which were rejected.

So thus we see that the War Department is still pursuing their same old tactics of omitting open competition and are continuing to purchase on a quantity basis for what is supposed to be experimental planes. In this particular case, for example, the Fairchild Aircraft Corporation bid $20,350 per plane less than the Douglas Aircraft Co., and their bid was considerable over the minimum requirements of the War Department, and yet they failed to receive any contract, and this is under the late improvements in procurement carried on about which Mr. Woodring says he is so proud. It would be of interest to find out—which is probably impossible under the present order of things—what kind and character of procurement the Government would receive if they advertised for bids as required under section 10a to 10e, where all people would have a chance to know what is going on and to bid on same, and then follow the procurement system as outlined in the law, so that after the design competition is completed that all would have an opportunity to bid on production contracts. If we could amend the law and place this matter back under the Comptroller's department, where it rightfully should have always stayed, we would have our procurement methods complied with instead of ignored, as shown from the above-quoted testimony and records.

SPARK PLUGS COME HIGH

On March 20, upon my request, I received a copy of the letter of the Comptroller General, Hon. J. R. McCarl, to the Secretary of War, as follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, March 20, 1936.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

SIR: There has been received your letter of February 6, 1936, as follows:

"Reference is made to your letter of January 16, 1936, file A-68803, relating to contract W 535 ac-7574, dated April 16, 1935, with the Hurley-Townsend Corporation, for the delivery of 1,400 spark plugs at a total cost of $4,158, and containing the statement that appropriated moneys may not legally be charged with the purchase of the spark plugs in question for reasons cited in said letter.

"This purchase was approved by direction of the Secretary of War under the provisions of section 10 (k) of the Air Corps Act of July 2, 1926, after an opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Army that approval could lawfully be given if in the judgment of the Secretary of War the spark plugs were necessary for experimental purposes as a procurement under the authority of said section 10 (k) of the act of July 2, 1926, and such approval would ratify and validate the contract in question. A photostatic copy of the entire correspondence in connection with the approval of the contract, with the endorsement containing the opinion of the Judge Advocate General, is enclosed herewith in explanation of the transaction.

"With regard to your statement that 'it is not understood why it should be necessary to purchase 1,400 spark plugs at a cost of $2.97 each, or a total cost of $4,158 for experimental purposes, and why a much smaller number of such spark plugs would not have been sufficient for such experimental purposes', a copy of procurement policy governing the procurement of aircraft engine spark plugs, dated February 7, 1935, is forwarded herewith, wherein provision is made for the procurement of spark plugs for service test purposes in a quantity not to exceed 2,000 under the provisions of paragraph (k), section 10, of the Air Corps Act approved July 2, 1926. The quantity of spark plugs purchased in this instance was the minimum quantity required to determine by actual use by tactical units whether the item would prove to be satisfactory in service.

"Your statement that 'it is not understood why spark plugs in accordance with standard Government specifications and drawings may be considered as experimental' is answered by stating that the spark plugs in question were of the contractor's design and reference was made to specification 95-28017-E, since this is a specification covering the general requirements on spark plugs and is applicable regardless of the quantity or status of spark plugs; that is, experimental, service test, or standard. Such a general specification is necessary in order to secure spark plugs of contractor's detailed design that will meet the general requirements of the Air Corps.

"Since the spark plugs in question were required for the purpose of conducting a formal service test on the latest type of shielded spark plugs manufactured by the Hurley-Townsend Corporation, and since procurement for the purpose intended is authorized under the provisions of section 10 (k) of the Air Corps Act, and in view of the opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Army that ratification and approval of the contract might lawfully be given by The Assistant Secretary of War if, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the spark plugs were necessary for experimental purposes as a procurement under the authority of said section 10 (k) of the Air Corps Act, it is recommended that the matter be reconsidered with a view to authorizing payment."

The referred to section 10 (k) of the act of July 2, 1926 (44 Stat. 787), provides that:

"(k) The Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, at his discretion, purchase abroad or in the United States, with or without competition, by contract or otherwise, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as may be necessary in his judgment for experimental purposes in the development of aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories of the best kind for the Army or the Navy, as the case may be, and if as a result of such procurement new and suitable designs considered to be the best kind for the Army or the Navy are developed, he may enter into contract, subject to the requirements of paragraph (j) of this section, for the procurement in quantity of such aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories without regard to the provisions of paragraphs (a) to (e), inclusive, hereof."

While said section authorizes purchases without competitive bidding, for experimental purposes, such designs, aircraft, aircraft parts, or aeronautical accessories as the Secretary may consider necessary in the ascertaining of the aircraft or aircraft parts or aeronautical accessories best for the needs of the Army, it provides no authority for quantity purchases without competitive bidding. Such designs or types of aircraft, parts, or accessories as in the judgment of the Secretary are worthy of consideration and tests may be purchased without competitive bidding, but only to the extent necessary for experimental purposes. With respect to quantity purchases there are applicable other provisions of law, particularly subsections (j) and (t) of the act of July 2, 1936. In this connection there is reason for pointing out that the procurement policy mentioned in the above-quoted letter, and apparently relied upon as authority for what appears to have been a quantity purchase without the safeguard of competitive bidding, was merely a creature of administration and could supply no authority beyond that conveyed by the act of July 2, 1926.

No facts have been supplied showing a need for as many as 1,400 spark plugs for purely experimental purposes, and there seems room for serious doubt whether any such quantity was actually or even reasonably necessary.

While, on the present record, and in view of a possible misunderstanding of the limitations upon purchases under subsection (k), no further objection appears necessary to uses of the appropriation in making otherwise proper payments in connection with this particular purchase, but prompt administrative action should be taken to prevent any attempted purchase under subsection (k) except in such quantity as clearly is necessary for experimentation.

Respectfully,

J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General of the United States.

Thus, it is seen how the War Department is now purchasing 1,400 spark plugs at a total cost of $4,158, or $2.97 each, under section 10 (k), claiming that it is necessary to so purchase them for experimental purposes. Had such spark plugs been purchased through open competitive bidding, there is no doubt but what they could have been purchased for much less money. There was no emergency shown and no satisfactory reason given why such a large number of spark plugs should be purchased without competition as provided by law. This is a fair example of what Mr. Woodring evidently means when he said, as above quoted, that he has "devoted a great deal of time and energy the past 2 years to the development of a procurement policy."

TEN-PERCENT PROFITS LIMITATIONS FOR NAVY

The 10-percent profits limitation was placed on the Vinson-Trammell Naval Act in March 1934 and has not proven cumbersome or unsatisfactory. The following regulations have been worked out to administer this act by the Treasury and Navy Departments:

The method of ascertaining the amount of excess profit to be paid to the United States in respect of contracts entered into under the Vinson Act shall be as follows:

"The excess profit shall be determined on each contract separately upon the completion or other termination of the contract. The amount of such excess profit shall be the amount of the profit on the contract in excess of 10 percent of the total contract price. The amount of the profit on the contract shall be the difference between the total contract price and the cost of performing the contract. The cost of performing the contract shall be the direct costs, such as material and labor, incurred by the contractor in performing the contract, plus a reasonable proportion of any indirect costs (including overhead or general expenses) appertaining to the contract which are not usually directly allocated to the cost of performing the contract. No general rule may be stated for ascertaining the reasonable proportion of the indirect costs to be allocated to the cost of performing a contract which would be applicable to all cases. The proper proportion of the indirect costs to be applied to the cost of performing a particular contract depends upon all the facts and circumstances relating to the performance of the particular contract. The contractor shall include as a part of the report required to be made to the Secretary of the Navy upon the completion or other termination of the contract a statement explaining the manner in which such indirect costs were determined and allocated to the cost of performing the contract."

A copy of the report relating to the contract required to be made to the Secretary of the Navy shall, immediately upon completion or other termination of the contract, be filed by the contractor with the collector of internal revenue for the collection district in which the contractor's Federal income-tax returns are required to be filed. The contractor shall pay any excess profit disclosed in such report to the collector of internal revenue at the time such report is filed.

The duty of determining the profit and the excess profit, if any, on contracts entered into under the Vinson Act is hereby delegated to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

If the Commissioner determines in respect of any contract entered into under the Vinson Act that there is an excess profit in an amount exceeding the excess profit, if any, shown upon the copy of the report filed with the collector of internal revenue and already paid, or, in case no such copy is filed and/or no excess profit is paid, the Commissioner finds and determines that the contract has been completed or otherwise terminated and that an excess profit has been received, the Commissioner may proceed to collect such unpaid excess profit under the usual methods employed under the internal-revenue laws to collect Federal income taxes.

The same satisfactory amendments can and should be provided for aircraft, ordnance, and procurement for the War Department, and I recommend to the free conference committee the following amendment be inserted in lieu of the amendment adopted by the House, which I am sure will secure the necessary results without working any hardship from an administrative standpoint on either Department:

SEC. 4. No appropriations herein, heretofore, or hereafter made shall be available to make any payment under any contract for the quantity purchase (exceeding two of each kind for experimental purposes) of any aircraft, ordnance material, automobiles, or trucks, or for any construction work under the control of the War Department, unless the contractor agrees—

(a) To make a report, as hereinafter described, under oath, to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue upon the completion of the contract.

(b) To pay into the Treasury profit, as hereinafter provides shall be determined by the Treasury Department, in excess of 10 percent of the total contract price as increased by incidental changes, if any, such amount to become the property of the United States: Provided, That if such amount is not voluntarily paid the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may collect the same under the usual methods employed under the internal-revenue laws to collect Federal income taxes.

(c) To make no subdivision of any contract or subcontract for the same or similar articles for the purpose of evading the provisions of this act, but any subdivision of any contract or subcontract involving an amount in excess of $10,000 shall be subject to the conditions herein prescribed.

(d) That the manufacturing spaces and books of its own plants, affiliates, and subdivisions shall at all times be subject to inspection and audit by any person designated by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and/or by a duly authorized committee of Congress.

(e) To make no subcontract unless the subcontractor or material man agrees to the foregoing conditions.

The method of ascertaining the amount of excess profit to be paid into the Treasury shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury in agreement with the Secretary of War and made available to the public. The method initially fixed upon shall be determined before June 30, 1936, but the terms of this act shall not apply to any contract actually signed as provided in section 3744, Revised Statutes, prior to the approval of this act: Provided, That for purposes of costs in determining excess profits under this act salaries and wages paid by a contractor after securing a contract with the War Department shall not be increased more than 10 percent over the amount paid to the officers and employees prior to obtaining such contract, and overhead allowed as a part of the cost shall not exceed the amount customarily allowed on the books of similar contractors and manufacturers. The determination of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be final and conclusive on the contractor for the purposes of this proviso: And provided further, That in any case where any excess profit may be found to be owing to the United States in consequence hereof the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall allow credit for any Federal income taxes paid or remaining to be paid upon the amount of such excess profit.

The contract or subcontracts referred to herein are limited to those where the contract price exceeds $10,000.

WAR DEPARTMENT AUDITS

In one breath General Craig testified the War Department auditors go carefully into every cost before a contract is awarded, and are in the factory during the life of the contract and in the next breath he states the administration of this provision will be very expensive and the auditing force would have to be greatly increased. As a result of our hearings before our committee investigating naval aircraft procurement, it was made plain that the Navy has no adequate system of checking overhead costs in aircraft factories. General Craig makes the same admissions as above shown, which is confirmed by existing facts in the lack of complete supervision of overhead costs in aircraft concerns selling all War Department equipment.

CONCLUSION

I trust that the membership of the House will insist upon ample time being given to the debate of the profits now being made on aircraft and other procurement so that we may go carefully into the merits and into the arguments advanced by the War Department as to reasons why no profits-limitation provisions should be placed upon the War Department appropriation bill. Every ex-service men's organization since the war has demanded that profits be taken out of war. Recent disclosures made by the Senate Munitions Committee, as well as disclosures made as shown by my minority report, clearly show the existence of an Air Trust and the total lack of any accurate system of checking overhead costs on Naval and War Departments aircraft procurement in determining proper division of costs between commercial and Government contracts convinces me that a 10-percent-profits limitation should be applied. The above letters from the Comptroller's Department clearly show a necessity for such a profits limitation.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that we ought to dispose of the District business if we are going to this afternoon, and then let these speeches come along afterward.

Mr. GREEN. I just want to ask permission to revise my remarks.

Mr. DIRKSEN. This District of Columbia bill is in the air, and I shall insist on the reservation until I can learn just what the program is going to be.

Mrs. NORTON. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in statements made by persons in Washington who desire the right to vote. I find in 40 or 41 States of the Union a method is provided for the registration of absentee voters, which would enable them to vote. It seems to me it may be of interest to the people of the District of Columbia to know that they now are qualified to vote in States of their actual residence, provided they avail themselves of the statutes that exist in those various States.

What is needed by the people of the city of Washington is not necessarily local franchise; they should exercise their existing voting rights by availing themselves of the absentee voters' laws of their respective States. I urge them to qualify and vote.

In the news of the world we read of the happenings in other climes. The chief issues of the day seem to be war and turmoil and uprising. Witness the conditions of strife-torn Europe; of torrid and darkest Africa; of the Far East and Mongol Asia; of the continent to the south of us; and even in our neighboring sister, Mexico, where the chief executive on retiring knows not whether his party will be in power when he arises to greet the sunrise of the coming day. We are fortunate, my friends, in living in a peace-loving Nation where all men are equal and every man has his equal voice in the Government. In the group of nations I have named "voice of the people" is not always registered—class distinction has prevented this—but in our own United States class distinction is eliminated and the voice of the poorest citizen can be heard along with that of the most wealthy. We are a free Nation; we are a liberty-loving people; and the voice of the people expressed in the ballot expresses the will of the Nation. In no other country of the world are the citizens as free and peace loving as in our great and powerful United States.

The ballot, my friends, is the symbol of freedom. The proper use of your ballot is not only a right of citizenship but is a privilege exercised only by free men. The ballot insures the perpetuation of our God-given American liberties. That all men shall be equal and have an equal voice is a guarantee of the Constitution. Compare this with the conditions existing in other countries, and you will find that the line of demarcation is the open privilege of franchise.

The ballot, my colleagues, is the dividing line between strife and peace. In this our general-election year every conscientious citizen should express his voice at the polls. The general election to be held on November 3 of this year should reflect the sentiment of the entire electorate of our Nation. Polls will be open on that day in every hamlet and village, and the citizenry, by following the proper procedure, may avail themselves of this inalienable privilege of free men. To be eligible to cast a ballot a person must, first of all, be a citizen of the United States, which is an honor I cherish even above that of being a Member of this body. He must also be a citizen of one of the States of our Union, of his county, and of a particular voting district. In most of our States he must be registered at various intervals, depending, of course, upon the laws of the particular State. In many of the States a capitation or poll tax is assessed against and must be paid by every voter. This registration, this payment of capitation or poll tax, this marching to the polls, this casting of the ballot involves a certain amount of sacrifice. It may take minutes, it may take an hour, it may cost you a few dollars; but in the end, when you have completed your duty, you can look any man in the face and say, "I am an American citizen; I have cast my ballot as a true and loyal citizen."

It so happens that many of our citizens have strayed far from the polling places in which they hold residence and are unable to return to register or vote. Forty of our States have made provisions for these absent voters. They are no longer in the rolls of absent voters, for, no matter where they may be, if they follow the provisions of their State's statutes, their franchise is available.

In order that the absentee voter of any State may have the full facilities for exercising his franchise, an absentee voter's bureau has been established on the mezzanine floor of the District National Bank Building, 1406 G Street NW., Washington, D. C., where the proper forms, information, and free notarial service may be obtained to assist the voter in expressing his voice in the governmental affairs of his State and Nation. This bureau is operated by the Women's National Council, a volunteer group of loyal women whose efforts are unceasing and whose faith in American principles is unflinching. The absentee voter's bureau is open daily, except Sunday, from 9 a. m. until 10 p. m.

My own State of Florida, in checking its citizenry, finds that thousands of its eligible voters have by circumstances and for business reasons found it necessary to drift to the various corners of our Nation. Over 2,000 are temporarily residing in Washington and vicinity. These citizens are now enfranchised and will be able to cast their ballots in all future elections, providing they make the necessary sacrifice of time and effort. In the 1935 session of the Florida Legislature, my State joined the other progressive States and made provisions for these absentee voters by enacting the Florida absentee registration law and the Florida absentee voting law, the text of which appears below. The Florida absentee laws are a model for the remaining States of the Union which have not as yet granted absentee privileges to its citizens. It is with pardonable pride that I give credit for the passage of these bills to Hon. Dan Kelly, representative from Nassau County, one of the smallest, though one of the most progressive counties of my district. Another of my constituents, Dan P. Mularkey, was the author of Florida's absentee laws. I commend him for his foresight in this wonderful service he has rendered the people of Florida.

I am pleased herewith to make available the following information on Florida absentee registration and voting and other information of interest to Florida absentee voters.

Election dates: Date first primary, June 2, 1936; date second primary, June 23, 1936; date general election, November 3, 1936.

ABSENTEE REGISTRATION INFORMATION

Time to apply for absentee registration: For primary elections, between March 1 and April 30, inclusive; for general election, between June 4 and October 10, inclusive. Persons registering for primary election will be qualified for following general elections.

Where to apply: Absentee Voters Bureau, Washington, D. C., in person, or apply by letter to supervisor of registration of your home county requesting absentee registration blanks. As the Absentee Voters Bureau has all information, forms, and notarial service, I would suggest that citizens apply there personally and save correspondence. No charge for notarial service.

Apply for your registration blanks as early as possible so that there will be no last-minute delay, and also to avoid double work to the volunteer workers who will have the responsibility of absentee-voting applications during the last few weeks of the registration period. Apply for absentee registration before April 15, if possible.

Counties of Florida in which a reregistration of voters is required in 1936: Alachua, Broward, Charlotte, Columbia, Dade, De Soto, Dixie, Duval, Escambia, Gilchrist, Hardee, Highlands, Hillsborough, Lafayette, Leon, Levy, Liberty, Madison, Monroe, Okeechobee, Orange, Palm Beach, Pinellas, Polk, St. Johns, Sarasota, Seminole, Suwannee, Volusia, and Walton.

In all other counties of the State, if you have registered and voted within recent years, you are still registered. To avoid any difficulty, I would suggest that if you have not voted since 1930, to file an absentee registration application.

Floridians temporarily residing in Washington—or in any State—who have not registered in any other State since temporarily removing from Florida, are eligible to register and vote.

POLL-TAX INFORMATION

No person shall be permitted to vote at any election who shall have failed to pay, on or before May 16, his or her poll taxes for the 2 years next preceding the year in which such election shall be held. Poll taxes for 1934 and 1935 are now due. Mail poll taxes to tax collector of your home county before May 16.

PERSONS EXEMPT FROM PAYMENT OF POLL TAXES

First. Persons becoming of age during election year—1936—shall not be required to pay poll taxes for the years in which he or she was not of age.

Second. If you were 55 years of age on January 1, 1934, you are exempt from all poll tax. If you were 55 on January 1, 1935, you will be required to pay for 1 year only.

Third. Disabled war veterans are exempt, but must exhibit a certificate of such disability to supervisor of registration.

Fourth. A person who has been a resident of Florida for only 1 year previous to any general election shall not be required to pay more than 1 year's poll tax.

Poll tax in Florida is $1 per year. To vote in any 1936 elections, including general election, poll taxes must be paid before midnight, May 16.

APPLICATION FOR ABSENTEE BALLOT—TIME TO APPLY

For primary absentee ballot: Application for absentee primary ballot must be in hands of county judge of your county before midnight of May 26. To avoid duplication of work, call at the absentee voter's bureau between April 15 and May 15 for your application for ballot.

In the case of the second primary applications for ballots must be made before June 16.

In the case of the general election application must be before October 27.

Official ballots must be marked and be in the hands of the county judge by midnight of the day on which the election is held.

Florida absentee laws also include provisions for any municipal elections.

All applications for absentee registration, applications for absentee ballots, and the ballot are required to bear a notary's seal. Notaries are on hand at all times at the bureau.

Remember the four steps in casting your absentee ballot: (1) Application for absentee registration; (2) payment of poll taxes, if required; (3) application for absentee ballot; (4) mailing the absentee ballot.

That an absentee Florida citizen should neglect any one of the above steps and thereby fail to cast his or her ballot means failure in this personal test of good citizenship.

It gives me great pleasure to list herewith the text of the Florida absentee registration law, the Florida absentee voting law, and the newly enacted redistricting law, which created another congressional district—the fifth—from parts of the first and fourth districts.

GENERAL STATEMENT ON ABSENTEE REGISTRATION AND ABSENTEE VOTING PROVISIONS IN THE LAWS OF VARIOUS STATES

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and to include therein a short excerpt from the Florida statutes relative to voting, and so forth.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to these speeches, but if we are going to do any business this afternoon I propose to have it come up first. May I ask someone on that side what the program is going to be?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, sometime ago the gentleman from Oklahoma came to me and asked if he might have 3 minutes. I promised him I would not object to his securing this time, but this is the last speech that I will not object to.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask further if it is the intention to take up anything else this afternoon besides the District business and the speeches that are desired to be made at this time?

The SPEAKER. That will depend on the time the House adjourns. I do not know how long the House will be in session.

Mr. SNELL. I understand there is no other business to come before the House. What I had in mind particularly was whether the long- and short-haul bill was to be taken up further this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised about that matter.

Mr. SNELL. May I ask the gentlemen on the other side if it is the intention to take up any other business this afternoon?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention to take up any other legislative business except the call of the District Committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield so that I may propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on the 16th I secured permission to date my remarks on March 20, which on March 3, I got permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include some excerpts from hearings and data which I am securing from the departments here in Washington. I find I will not be able to get all this data before Friday, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend the time for the extension of my remarks until next Friday, instead of the 20th.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this time in order that I might have the opportunity to read to the Members of the House an order recently issued relative to C. C. C. camps, which I am sure will be of interest to every Member. This letter is directed to Hon. Robert Fechner, Director of Emergency Conservation Work, Washington, D. C., and reads as follows:

HON. ROBERT FECHNER,
Director of Emergency Conservation Work,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FECHNER: In reviewing the Emergency Conservation Work program for the period ending March 31, 1937, at which date the emergency conservation work will terminate according to existing law, I have determined that the present number of Civilian Conservation Corps camps shall be maintained unless such camps are reduced as a result of the completion of the work now being performed by the enrollees of any such camps, or the reduction through discharges, separations, or other causes in the number of enrollees to approximately 163 in any one camp.

I have also determined that the total number of enrollees for the Civilian Conservation Corps should be gradually reduced to about 350,000 and this number maintained through March 31, 1937.

It is appreciated that no hard-and-fast rule can be laid down. You are therefore authorized to take such measures as may be necessary to carry out this general program as nearly as may be practicable.

Additional funds not to exceed $6,825,000 will be allotted to you as and when needed from the appropriation contained in the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 for the balance of this fiscal year, and steps will be taken to secure the necessary funds for the fiscal year 1937.

Very truly yours,

Mr. Speaker, this simply means that the present number of camps will be maintained as they are until the 31st of March 1937, which is the time limitation in the original act. Since the purposes for which the recent petition calling a Democratic caucus have been accomplished, this caucus will not be called. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to my colleague from Oklahoma.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman for the splendid work he has done in aiding the retention of the C. C. C. camps until March 1937, and to tell him that those of us who were closely associated with him in the courageous and successful fight made by the gentleman keenly appreciate the efforts of the chairman, who played a very important role in getting this job done.

Mr. NICHOLS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I also join with my colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma in his words of appreciation. However, may I express the further thought that the civilian conservation workers of the United States have been of splendid assistance in the stricken flooded areas and have met the emergency well.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 1 additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. GREEVER. I want also to add to what has been said here my appreciation of what the gentleman has done along this line, because the C. C. C. camps have done a great work in the West in connection with the parks and forests and grazing areas, as well as in other places, and this action of the President is indeed gratifying.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. As one of the enlisted men I also want to commend the gentleman for his splendid work.

Mr. NICHOLS. I want to thank every Member of the House for his cooperation and for the assistance which the membership has given me in this fight. [Applause.]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (H. R. 11689) to amend title I of the National Housing Act, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

ELECTRIC HOME AND FARM AUTHORITY

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (S. 3424) to continue Electric Home and Farm Authority as an agency of the United States until February 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is this bill?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is a bill to extend the Electric Home and Farm Authority.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will that report be available for a hearing before the Rules Committee tomorrow?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes; it will be filed tonight.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If it is not filed until midnight tonight, it might not be printed in time to be available.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. As a matter of fact, it is ready now, and will be filed right away.

Mr. McFARLANE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, how does this bill differ from the Rural Electrification Authority?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It is a different Authority. This has more to do with urban homes than rural homes.

Mr. McFARLANE. I am in favor of it if it will help to whip the Power Trust.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

INFORMATION CONCERNING BENEFITS AVAILABLE TO VETERANS AND THEIR DEPENDENTS UNDER LAWS ADMINISTERED BY THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION AND OTHER GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES, INCLUDING THE WAR DEPARTMENT AND CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, May 15, 1934, I prepared a statement in regard to veterans and their dependents. Several hundred thousand of these statements in pamphlet form were purchased by Members of Congress and different veterans' organizations and distributed widely over the country. Many referred to this pamphlet as the "veterans' bible."

With the assistance and cooperation of Mr. Earl D. Chesney, liaison representative of the Veterans' Administration on Capitol Hill, and with the full and complete cooperation of Gen. Frank T. Hines and the Veterans' Administration, I have prepared another pamphlet, which is more complete and comprehensive than the one of May 15, 1934. It has been prepared to provide helpful information to persons who have served in the armed forces of the United States in time of war or peace and to the dependents of such veterans regarding the rights to monetary and other benefits which may be obtained by applying to the Veterans' Administration, the agency established to administer existing laws relating to these matters.

The purpose sought to be attained is to state in a general way the different benefits and the most essential requirements which must be met by a claimant with respect to each. No effort has been made to provide detailed technical information on constructions and interpretations of the veterans' acts, such as would be essential in the adjudication of claims. The statement also includes information concerning veterans' preference to civil-service employment, burial in national cemeteries, headstones, and benefits given by States.

Nothing of its kind has ever before been presented by any Government department or veterans' organization.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to insert this information in the Record, together with such extracts from the laws and regulations as may be necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans' Administration was established on July 21, 1930, as the result of an act of Congress (Public 536, 71st Cong.) passed on July 3, 1930, which authorized the consolidation into one Federal establishment of those agencies created for or concerned in the administration of laws relating to the relief and other benefits provided by law for former members of the Military and Naval Establishments and their dependents. These agencies were the Bureau of Pensions, the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and the United States Veterans' Bureau. As one result of the consolidation the entire subject of veterans' relief, and especially the inequalities and inconsistencies existing in the measure of relief granted to veterans and their families, were brought into greater prominence. This, together with the inception of a severe economic depression and other reasons, occasioned the enactment into law on March 20, 1933, of a law known as Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress. This act did not disturb monetary benefits based upon service prior to the beginning of the Spanish-American War on April 21, 1898, except to provide for a percentage reduction in pension based upon service prior to that time for wartime veterans and their dependents, and this reduction has since been eliminated. The law did repeal, however, the laws granting the following major benefits, but authorized their continuation in modified form:

1. Medical and hospital treatment and domiciliary care.
2. Payment of pension and other allowances to Spanish-American War veterans and their dependents.
3. Payment of pension and other allowances to former members of the military or naval service who served on or after April 21, 1898, and their dependents.

4. Compensation, emergency officers' retirement pay, and other allowances to World War veterans and their dependents.

The act of March 20, 1933, also authorized the President of the United States to prescribe, by regulation, and within certain limitations stipulated in that act, the conditions under which persons who served in the armed forces of the United States on or after April 21, 1898, and their dependents may be granted benefits. The same act provided that the regulations issued by the President which were in effect 2 years from the date of the act on March 20, 1933, should continue in effect without further change or modification except by the Congress.

In addition to the veterans' regulations issued by the President, the Congress has enacted legislation since March 20, 1933, which liberalized and in large measure restored benefits payable to war veterans who served on or after April 21, 1898, and their dependents. The result is that many veterans may be entitled to benefits under more than one act of Congress. For this reason, when the benefits available to persons who served on or after April 21, 1898, are described, it will be indicated whether the benefits are authorized under the act of March 20, 1933, or by other legislation.

From the above it will be seen that April 21, 1898, is a highly significant date in the present development of veterans' legislation, and for this reason this pamphlet endeavors to explain the functioning of the Veterans' Administration and the laws which it administers by presenting the subject matter under the following four parts:

I. Functions and location of the Veterans' Administration and its field stations.

II. Monetary benefits available to veterans and their dependents based upon service in the armed forces of the United States prior to April 21, 1898.

III. Pension and compensation available to veterans and their dependents based upon service in the armed forces of the United States on or after April 21, 1898.

IV. Hospital and domiciliary care and other benefits.

PART I

FUNCTIONS AND LOCATION OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION AND ITS FIELD STATIONS

The Veterans' Administration, under the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, maintains a central office located in the Arlington Building, Washington, D. C., and 108 field stations located in the various States and Territorial possessions. There are in addition two supply depots, one located at 1749 West Pershing Road, McKinley Park Station, Chicago, Ill., and the other at Perry Point, Md. In addition to the supervision of all the field stations the central office is solely responsible for the administration of the laws pertaining to Government life insurance and the adjudication of claims for benefits thereunder, except in litigated cases; the issuance of adjusted-service (bonus) certificates and the adjudication of claims in reference to adjusted compensation; the adjudication of pension claims based upon service in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, except for such service between April 6, 1917, and July 2, 1921; the adjudication of pension and compensation claims on account of the death of veterans; the adjudication of all emergency officers' retirement benefits; and the adjudication of claims of veterans and their dependents who reside in foreign countries. Central office is also responsible for the final consideration and disposition of appeals to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. These appeals involve pension, compensation, emergency officers' retirement benefits, Government insurance, adjusted compensation, death benefits of all kinds, incompetency, and mixed appeals, such as forfeiture of rights, recoveries, relationship, and so forth.

THE FIELD ORGANIZATION OF THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

All of the following field stations are in charge of managers who are directly responsible to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. These stations are located throughout the United States and are classified as follows: Veterans' Administration regional offices, Veterans' Administration facilities having regional-office functions in addition to hospital and domiciliary activities, Veterans' Administration facilities having only hospital and domiciliary activities.

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION REGIONAL OFFICES

The Veterans' Administration has 25 regional offices and 28 facilities having regional-office activities. The principal functions of regional offices, as regards veterans residing within their respective areas, are generally:

2. Preparation and adjudication of all claims for compensation, pension of veterans who served between April 6, 1917, and July 2, 1921, and for other benefits awardable by Veterans' Administration facilities or regional offices.

3. Guardianship activities, including the determination and certification and legality of the appointment of guardians or other fiduciaries.

4. Making of medical examinations of claimants and beneficiaries for benefits.

SERVICE PRIOR TO THE CIVIL WAR

There are no beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, either veterans or dependents of the War of the Revolution surviving.

Since the beneficiaries of Federal pension, based upon service in the War of 1812 and the Mexican War, are comparatively few, due to the lapse of time since these conflicts, it is deemed unnecessary to include herein a description of the nature and extent of benefits granted to the dependents of persons who served in those wars. There are no veterans of these wars now living.

The rate of payment ranges from $12 to $30 per month, depending upon the time the service was rendered and the rank of the veteran at the date he contracted his fatal disability, with $2 for each of his children under the age of 16 or helpless. This pension is payable to the veteran's survivors in the following order of preference:

1. To the widow regardless of the date of her marriage to the veteran or her financial condition.
2. If there is no widow entitled to payment, then to the veteran's child or children under age of 16 or helpless.
3. If there is no widow or child entitled to take and the mother is without adequate means of support other than her own manual labor and the contributions of others not legally bound for her support, then to such dependent mother of the veteran.

Applications by widows should be made on V. A. Form 5016, and by children on V. A. Form 5018, and by dependent parents on V. A. Form 535, and the forms should be sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

SERVICE PENSIONS (FOR NON-SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY), CIVIL WAR VETERANS

The Civil War period extended from April 12, 1861, to August 20, 1866, but enlistments must have been prior to April 13, 1865, in the Army, or July 1, 1865, in the Navy, unless part of the veteran's service was rendered in a State considered disloyal or, in the case of naval service, in waters adjacent to such considered disloyal States.

Any veteran who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and was honorably discharged from all enlistments during that period, or who, having served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in line of duty, may be entitled to a pension of $75 per month. Any such veteran who is now or hereafter may become, by reason of age or physical or mental disability, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to require regular aid or attendance of another person, is entitled to a pension of $100 per month.

Any veteran who was honorably discharged from his last enlistment in the service during the Civil War will be held to have been honorably discharged from all previous enlistments, provided the last contract of service was for not less than 6 months, and provided that his entire service during this last period was faithful and that he did not receive, by reason of this last enlistment, any bounty or gratuity other than from the United States in excess of what he would have been entitled to had he served faithfully through all previous periods of service during the Civil War. He may be entitled to pension in the amounts shown in the paragraph immediately preceding.

Any veteran who was not regularly mustered into the service of the United States but who served honorably for 90 days or more during the Civil War, in any of the organizations granted a pensionable status by special legislation, may be entitled to pension at the rates of $75 or $100 as the case may be. These organizations were: The Missouri State Militia, the Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia, the Pennsylvania Emergency Militia, the First Regiment Ohio Light Artillery, Capt. David Beaty's company of Independent Tennessee Scouts, Capt. Goldman Bryson's company of North Carolina Mounted Volunteers.

Service pension for a Civil War veteran is subject to a reduction of $25 monthly while he is in a State soldiers' home, or the United States Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., or while he has dependents and is in receipt of hospital, domiciliary, or institutional care from the Veterans' Administration. If he has no dependents and is receiving hospital, domiciliary, or institutional care from the Veterans' Administration his pension is reduced to $15 a month. Service pension for Civil War veterans will commence from the date of filing claim with the Veterans' Administration which should be made on V. A. Form 3-026 and it should be sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C. No formal claim is required for increased pension, it being sufficient for the veteran or someone acting in his behalf to file a request for the additional amount and to forward at the same time a statement from a physician showing the veteran's physical or mental condition.

The rate of pension is $30 per month plus $6 for each of the veteran's children under the age of 16. The pension is payable in the following order of preference:

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

PENSION FOR VETERANS OF THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, INCLUDING THE PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION AND BOXER REBELLION, FOR DISABILITY INCURRED DURING SUCH WAR SERVICE

Act of March 20, 1933

Under the act of March 20, 1933, and the Executive orders which followed it, veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, who were in the active service and honorably discharged, and including contract nurses, and who were disabled in the service or whose preexisting disabilities were aggravated by service, may be paid pension according to the degree of disability shown.

The rates range from $10 to $100 per month in 10 steps and there are special rates payable for certain specific disabilities, such as extensive anatomical loss or loss of use, helplessness, blindness, and so forth, ranging as high as $250 per month. These disabilities are based as far as practicable upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such disabilities in civil occupations. Advantages are extended to veterans of this class in making determinations of service connection in cases where proof of service connection is not possible when the circumstances in the individual case reasonably warrant that service connection may be presumed. Pension in these cases may not be paid for disability on account of a veteran's own misconduct.

Federal employment at a salary or compensation in excess of $1,000 per annum computed monthly for a single person and of $2,500 per annum computed monthly for a married person or a person with minor children bars the right to pension except (1) for an injury received in combat with an enemy of the United States or for disabilities resulting from an explosion of an instrumentality of war, and (2) to those persons so employed who were receiving pension on March 19, 1933, in which latter event $6 per month is payable.

If a veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent and receives hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care from the United States or a political subdivision thereof, the amount of pension is reduced to $15 per month.

A Spanish-American War veteran in order to be entitled to service-connected benefits under the act of March 20, 1933, as described immediately above, must have served during one of the following periods:

Spanish-American War: An enlistment entered into or extending into the period beginning April 21, 1898, and ending August 12, 1898, both dates inclusive.

Philippine Insurrection: An enlistment entered into or extending into the period from August 13, 1898, to July 4, 1902, both dates inclusive, provided the person actually participated in the insurrection, or was en route thereto for the purpose of participating. In the event such persons served with the military forces engaged in hostilities in the Moro Province the termination date of the insurrection is extended to July 15, 1903.

Boxer Rebellion: An enlistment entered into or extending into the period from June 20, 1900, to May 12, 1901, both dates inclusive, provided the person actually participated in the rebellion.

Act of August 13, 1935

Under the laws reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935 (Public, No. 269, 74th Cong.), a veteran of the Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and the Boxer Rebellion, may also be entitled to a pension (but not both at the same time) if he is disabled by reason of wounds or injuries received or disabilities contracted in the service in line of duty. The pension is payable according to the degree of disability shown or in the case of permanent specific disability is payable in the amounts fixed by law or otherwise for disabilities as shown in the tables.

Pension, under the law reenacted August 13, 1935, is not subject to reduction by reason of the veteran's employment by the Federal Government, as is the pension which is payable under the act of March 20, 1933, but is reduced to $15 per month if the veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent, and is furnished hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care by the Veterans' Administration.

Under the laws reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935, the periods of war service are as follows:

Spanish-American War: Period of the War with Spain was from April 21, 1898, to April 11, 1899, inclusive.

Philippine Insurrection: The Philippine Insurrection was from April 12, 1899, to July 4, 1902, inclusive, unless the person served in the Moro Province, in which event the termination date of the Philippine Insurrection is July 15, 1903. Participation in the insurrection is not required under this law.

Boxer Rebellion (China Relief Expedition): The period of the Boxer Rebellion was from June 16, 1900, to May 12, 1901, inclusive, provided the person actually participated therein.

Application for this pension should be made on V. A. Form 526 and sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

The term "child" for the payment of benefit described above means a legitimate child or a child legally adopted, unmarried, and under the age of 18 years, unless prior to reaching the age of 18 the child becomes permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect except that the payment of pension may further continue after the age of 18 years and until completion of education or training in an approved school but not after such child reaches the age of 21 years.

The rate of payment ranges from $12 to $30 per month, depending upon the kind of services rendered and the rank of the veteran at the time he contracted his fatal disability, with $2 for each of his children under the age of 16, which pension may be continued after age 16 to or for a helpless child. The minimum rate for the widow of a veteran of the Spanish-American War or Philippine Insurrection is $25.

5. If there is no widow, child, mother, or father entitled to payment, then to the orphan brothers and sisters under 16 years of age.

Under the act of May 1, 1926, as reenacted, the surviving widow and minor children of a veteran of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, or Boxer Rebellion who died in the service of a disability incurred in line of duty may be entitled to a pension of $30 per month plus $6 additional for each minor child under 16 years of age.

How to apply: For service-connected death pension for widows and children of veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and Boxer Rebellion, application should be made by the use of V. A. Form 534 and for dependent parents V. A. Form 535, and should be filed with the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

PENSION FOR VETERANS OF THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, INCLUDING PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION AND BOXER REBELLION, FOR DISABILITIES NOT INCURRED DURING SUCH WAR SERVICE

In addition to pensions payable for disability resulting from diseases or injuries incurred in or aggravated by service, veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and the Boxer Rebellion, may be entitled to pensions for disability resulting from diseases and injuries which cannot be shown to be due to their war service. Such veterans may be entitled to a pension under one of several acts of Congress.

Act of March 20, 1933

Under the act of March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), and the Executive orders which followed it, a pension of $30 per month may be paid for permanent and total disability, providing the disability is not the result of the veteran's own misconduct and was not incurred in any period of military or naval service. To be eligible to this pension, the veteran must have served 90 days or more in the active military or naval service during the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, or Boxer Rebellion, and must have been honorably discharged, or, having served less than 90 days, must have been discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty. He must be shown to have been in the active service before the cessation of hostilities.

If such a veteran is not permanently and totally disabled, but is 50 percent disabled, he may receive a pension of $15 per month.

Any such veteran over 62 years of age may be entitled to receive a pension of not more than $15 per month because of such age.

This pension is not payable if the disability is the result of the veteran's own misconduct, nor if his income, if unmarried, exceeds $1,000, or if married or with minor children exceeds $2,500, except that the $15 pension to veterans over 62 years of age is payable irrespective of income.

If the veteran receives hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care from the United States or a political subdivision thereof, and has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent, this pension is reduced to $6 per month.

Act of August 13, 1935 (service pension)

Under the act of August 13, 1935 (Public, 269, 74th Cong.), all the pension laws in effect March 19, 1933, which granted pensions to veterans of the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, and Boxer Rebellion were reenacted in their entirety, and under these laws such a veteran may be entitled to a pension for a disability resulting from diseases or injuries not connected with his war service, or because of age. Under the laws reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935, the periods of war service are as shown herein.

Any person who served 90 days or more during such war, insurrection, or rebellion, and was honorably discharged from such service, or if he served less than 90 days and was discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty, may be paid a pension on account of disability or age. A pension may also be paid for disability or age to those persons who served 70 days or more but less than 90 days during such war, insurrection, or rebellion.

The rates of pension for disability not due to service are shown below:

Amount disabled	90 days or disability discharge	70 days
	Per month	Per month
$\frac{1}{16}$	\$20	\$12
$\frac{1}{8}$	25	15
$\frac{3}{16}$	35	18
$\frac{1}{4}$	50	24
Total.....	60	30

In lieu of pension for disability, the veteran may be entitled to a pension on account of age, payable at the following rates:

Age	90 days or disability discharge	70 days
	Per month	Per month
62 years.....	$30	$12
65 years.....	40	18
72 years.....	50	24
75 years.....	60	30

It is provided that if such a veteran, who served 90 days, or if he served less than 90 days, was discharged for disability incurred in service in line of duty, is so helpless, or blind, or so nearly so as to require the regular aid and attendance of another, $72 per month is payable. If such a veteran served 70 days, but less than 90 days, $50 per month is payable.

Disability because of misconduct of a veteran is not a bar to pension under this act.

Pension payable to all such persons is subject to reduction to $6 per month when the veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent, and is in receipt of hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care from the Veterans' Administration. Such pension is also subject to reduction to an amount not to exceed $50 per month while the veteran is a member of the United States Soldiers' Home, Washington, D. C., Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa., or of any State soldiers' home, even though the veteran has a wife, child, or dependent parent.

How to apply: Application for non-service-connected pension by veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and Boxer Rebellion, regardless of whether the pension is authorized by Public, No. 2 of the Seventy-third Congress, or Public, No. 269 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, as described herein, should be made on V. A. Form 526 if application has not already been made, and the claim should be forwarded to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEPENDENTS OF SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS INCLUDING PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION AND BOXER REBELLION WHOSE DEATH WAS NOT CAUSED BY SUCH WAR SERVICE

As is the case with veterans, the widows and children of veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Boxer Rebellion, and the Philippine Insurrection whose death did not result from diseases or injuries incurred or aggravated by military service may be entitled to a pension under the act of March 20, 1933, or under the pension acts which were reenacted by the act of August 13, 1935.

Act of March 20, 1933

Under the act of March 20, 1933, the surviving widow and children of any deceased person who served in the active military or naval service during the Spanish-American War,

Boxer Rebellion, or Philippine Insurrection may be entitled to a pension at the following rates:

Widow but no children, $15 per month.

Widow and one child, $20 per month (with $3 monthly for each additional child).

No widow but one child, $12 per month.

No widow but two children, $15 (equally divided).

No widow but three children, $20 (equally divided; with $2 monthly for each additional child, total amount to be equally divided.)

The total pension payable cannot exceed $27 monthly. Where such benefits would otherwise exceed $27 monthly the amount of $27 may be apportioned.

Act of August 13, 1935

Under the act of August 13, 1935, there was reenacted the act of May 1, 1926, Public, No. 166, Sixty-ninth Congress, under which widows and minor children under 16 years of age or helpless of a person who served in the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, or Boxer Rebellion may be entitled to a pension at the rate of $30 per month, plus $6 additional for each minor child under the age of 16, which pension may be continued after age 16 to or for a helpless child. The veteran must have served 90 days or have been discharged for disability contracted within service in line of duty within the following periods:

Spanish-American War: Period of the War with Spain was from April 21, 1898, to April 11, 1899, inclusive.

Philippine Insurrection: The Philippine Insurrection was from April 12, 1899, to July 4, 1902, inclusive.

Boxer Rebellion (China Relief Expedition): The period of the Boxer Rebellion was from June 16, 1900, to May 12, 1901, inclusive, provided the person actually participated therein.

The veteran must have been honorably discharged from all contracts of service during the period of the war, insurrection, or rebellion. No period of service rendered prior to April 21, 1898, nor subsequent to July 4, 1902, may be counted in computing the 90 days, nor can short periods of service in two or more designated periods be combined to create the 90 days required.

The term "widow" means a person who was married to the veteran prior to September 1, 1922, and includes such a widow who has been remarried once or more than once if her subsequent or successive marriage or marriages has or have been dissolved either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce on any ground except adultery on the part of the wife.

In case of death, remarriage, or forfeiture of the pension by the widow, the child or children stand in the place of the widow and receive the full pension she would receive. The term "child" means a legitimate child under 16 years of age.

Use V. A. Form 534 and send it to the Veterans' Administration at Washington, D. C.

HALF PENSION PAYABLE TO WIFE OR CHILDREN OF A VETERAN

Under the act of March 3, 1899, which is among the laws reenacted on August 13, 1935, it is provided that one-half of the pension due any veteran, who is a resident of the United States, who served prior to April 21, 1898, or to any veteran of the Spanish-American War, Boxer Rebellion, or Philippine Insurrection, may be paid to his wife or children under the following conditions:

1. If the veteran deserts his wife for more than 6 consecutive months and his wife is of good moral character and in necessitous circumstances, or if there is no wife entitled to this pension, deserts his legitimate child or children under 16 years of age or his permanently helpless and dependent child or children; or

2. If such a veteran enters the United States Soldiers' Home, the Naval Home, or a State home, one-half of his pension which accrues during his residence therein may be paid to his wife, she being a woman of good moral character and in necessitous circumstances, or to his children unless they are also in a home provided for wives and children of soldiers and sailors.

Applications should be made by the veteran's wife on V. A. Form 5015 and be accompanied by sufficient proof to establish a prima-facie case of desertion and that the wife is of good moral character and in necessitous circumstances, and should be sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C. Where there is no wife, the veteran's child or children should use V. A. Form 5014.

WORLD WAR

DISABILITY COMPENSATION FOR VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR FOR DISABILITIES INCURRED IN OR AGGRAVATED BY SUCH WAR SERVICE

Act of March 20, 1933

Under the act of March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), a veteran of the World War whose disability was incurred in or aggravated by actual service and in line of duty, may be paid disability compensation according to the degree of disability shown. This disability compensation carries the same rates as those shown for Spanish-American War veterans, ranging from $10 to $250 per month, and payments thereof are subject to the same provisions with respect to Federal employment and the receipt of hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care from the United States or a political subdivision thereof.

To be entitled to disability compensation under this provision of law the veteran must have served during an enlistment or employment entered into or extending into the period from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918, inclusive, and have been honorably discharged. The disability must have occurred in or have been aggravated by service during such enlistment and prior to July 2, 1921, and must not have resulted from misconduct. For those who served in the military forces in Russia the terminating date of the World War period is extended to and includes April 1, 1920.

Draftees: Also entitled to disability compensation is any person who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the active military or naval forces and who was provisionally accepted and directed or ordered to report to a place for final acceptance into such military service, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, was drafted and after reporting pursuant to the call of his local draft board and prior to rejection, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, after being called into the Federal service as a member of the National Guard but before being enrolled for the Federal service suffered an injury or disease in line of duty and not the result of his own misconduct. A draftee is one who was called but for some reason not accepted, and therefore did not receive a discharge from military service, only receiving a discharge from the draft.

Act of March 28, 1934

World War veterans may be entitled to compensation under the provisions of another act of Congress known as Public, No. 141, Seventy-third Congress, dated March 28, 1934, which reenacted many of the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, which had been repealed by the act of March 20, 1933. Under the provisions of the act of March 28, 1934, rates range from $8 to $275 per month, and disabilities are evaluated as far as practicable upon the handicap the particular disability would cause to the average individual in the veteran's pre-war occupation. Under this act disability compensation is payable for temporary disabilities as well as for permanent disabilities, and many diseases causing disability which cannot be shown to be due to service under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933, may be compensable through the reenactment of certain sections of the World War Veterans' Act—which presumed certain diseases shown to have existed to a 10-percent degree by January 1, 1925, for example, to be due to the person's military or naval service during the World War. This act also provides for the continuation of payments at the rates being paid on March 19, 1933, to those persons who were in receipt of disability compensation prior to the act of March 20, 1933, for directly service-connected disabilities, unless their disabilities were the result of their own misconduct and except where payments were being made because of fraud, misrepresentation of a material fact, or unmistakable error. This act also provides for the continuation of 75 percent of the rate being paid on March 19, 1933, to those whose disability is reestablished under the presumptive provisions referred to above. The protection of the rates being paid March 19, 1933, does not apply where there is a change in physical condition.

Under this provision of law, however, Federal employment of the veteran does not result in reduction of the monthly rate of compensation, but the receipt of hospital, institutional, or domiciliary care from the United States or a political subdivision thereof causes a reduction to $15 per month if the veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent.

To be entitled under this act the veteran must have entered the active military service on or before November 11, 1918, unless the veteran served with the United States military forces in Russia prior to April 2, 1920, in which event he may have entered the active service after November 11, 1918.

How to apply: World War veterans should use V. A. Form 526 and send it to the proper field office of the Veterans' Administration.

DEATH COMPENSATION FOR WIDOWS, CHILDREN, AND DEPENDENT PARENTS OF WORLD WAR VETERANS WHOSE DEATH RESULTED FROM SERVICE

Act of March 20, 1933

Under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933 (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.), the surviving widow, child or children, and dependent parents of deceased veterans of the World War who died as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service are entitled to receive death compensation at the same rates prescribed for dependents of Spanish-American War veterans.

The term "widow" of a veteran of the World War means a person married to the veteran prior to July 3, 1931, and who has not remarried.

The definition of the term "child" likewise applies to children of a World War veteran.

The term "mother" or "father" means the natural mother or father of the veteran or the mother or father of the veteran through legal adoption.

Act of March 28, 1934

Under the provisions of the act of March 28, 1934 (Public, No. 141, 73d Cong.), payments being made to widows, children, and dependent parents of World War veterans prior to the passage of the act of March 20, 1933, are continued and protected, with the result that the surviving widow, child, and dependent parents who might not be entitled under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933, continue to receive payments at the rates in effect March 19, 1933, which were:

1. If there is a widow but no children, $30 per month.
2. If there is a widow and one child, $40 per month (with $6 per month for each additional child).
3. If there is no widow but one child, $20 per month.
4. If there is no widow but two children, $30 per month.
5. If there is no widow but three children, $40 per month (with $5 per month for each additional child).
6. If there is a dependent mother or dependent father, $20 per month, or both, $30 per month.

The amount payable cannot exceed the difference between the total amount payable to the widow and children, and the sum of $75 per month, except when there is both a dependent mother and a dependent father, in which event the amount payable to them is not less than $20 per month.

The definition of "child" applies to benefits payable under this provision of law.

The terms "mother" and "father" include stepmothers and stepfathers, mothers and fathers through adoption, and persons who have stood in the relationship of a parent for a period of not less than 1 year prior to the veteran's entrance into the service.

How to apply: Claims by widows and children should be made on V. A. Form 534 and claims by dependent parents on V. A. Form 535 and all such applications filed with the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

PENSION FOR VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR FOR DISABILITIES NOT INCURRED IN OR AGGRAVATED BY WAR SERVICE

Any World War veteran who served in the active military or naval service for a period of 90 days or more and was honorably discharged or who having served less than 90 days was discharged for disability incurred in the service in line of duty and who was in the service before November 11, 1918, or if he served with the United States military forces in Russia, was in the active military service prior to April 2, 1920, may be entitled to receive a pension of $30 per month for permanent and total disability if not the result of his own misconduct and if not shown to have been incurred in any period of the military or naval service.

This pension is not payable if the veteran's income if unmarried exceeds $1,000, or if married or with minor children exceeds $2,500, and is reduced to $6 per month when a veteran who has neither wife, child, nor dependent parent, is in receipt of hospital, institutional or domiciliary care from the United States or a political subdivision thereof.

Applications should be made on V. A. Form 526 and sent to the proper field office of the Veterans' Administration.

COMPENSATION TO WIDOWS AND CHILDREN OF WORLD WAR VETERANS WHO DIED FROM DISABILITIES NOT INCURRED DURING THEIR WAR SERVICE

Act of June 28, 1934

On June 28, 1934 (Public, No. 484, 73d Cong.), a law was passed which authorized the payment of compensation to the unmarried widow and children of a person who, while receiving monetary benefits for disabilities directly incurred in World War service, or has died from a disease or disability not service connected and not the result of the veteran's own misconduct.

Service must have been rendered after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, or if the veteran served in Russia, before April 2, 1920.

Such veteran must have been receiving or entitled to receive at the time of his death compensation or retirement pay for a disability directly incurred in or aggravated by service in the World War, rated to the extent of 30 percent or more.

No such widow or child is entitled to receive compensation during any year following a year for which not exempt from the payment of a Federal income tax.

The monthly rates of compensation for widows and children are as follows:

Widow with no children, $22 per month.

Widow and one child, $30 per month (with $4 for each additional child).

No widow but one child, $15 per month.

No widow but two children, $22 (equally divided).

No widow but three children, $30 (equally divided) (with $3 for each additional child, total amount to be equally divided. The total compensation may not exceed $56 per month).

Payments of this character commence from June 28, 1934, in all cases where the death of the veteran occurred prior to that date. In all other cases payment commences from the date of filing claim with the Veterans' Administration.

The widow must have been married to the veteran prior to July 3, 1931, and must not have remarried.

The term "child" means a person unmarried and under the age of 18, unless prior to reaching the age of 18 the child becomes or has become permanently incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect, who is a legitimate child, a child legally adopted, a stepchild if a member of the man's household, an illegitimate child, but, as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing signed by him or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support, or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child. The payment of compensation may be continued after age 18, and until completion of education or training in an approved school but not after such child reaches the age of 21 years.

Application for this benefit should be made on V. A. Form 534 and sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

WHEN THERE IS ENTITLEMENT UNDER MORE THAN ONE LAW, THE LAW GRANTING THE GREATER BENEFIT IS APPLIED

In the administration of the laws granting benefits to veterans of the armed forces of the United States and to their dependents, when such persons are entitled to benefits under more than one law the greater benefit is paid. For example, a widow of a Civil War veteran who was the wife of the veteran while he was in the service during the Civil War and who lost his life during such service, may be entitled to $30 or less per month as the widow of that deceased veteran, based upon the service-connected death. However, it has been pointed out that under ordinary conditions she would be entitled to $50 per month service pension on the basis of non-service-connected death of the veteran. In such case she would be awarded the greater benefit. And again, a Spanish-American War veteran, meeting the requirements for a pension based upon non-service-connected disability under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933, and the Executive orders which followed it, may be entitled to $30 per month because of a permanent and total disability, but under the laws reenacted August 13, 1935, he may be entitled to $72 per month, in which event the greater amount would be awarded.

DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIREMENT PAY

On May 24, 1928, a law was enacted which provided, among other things, that all persons who have served as officers of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the World War, other than as officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who during such service have incurred physical disability in line of duty, and who have been, or may within 1 year after passage of this act be rated in accordance with law at not less than 30-percent permanently disabled, for such disability, resulting directly from such war service, shall, from the date of the receipt of application, be placed upon, and thereafter continued on, a retired list at 75 percent of the pay to which they were entitled at the time of their discharge from their commissioned service, with certain exceptions. It was provided in that law that a claim for this benefit, in order to be valid, must have been made within 1 year from the date of the enactment of that law.

The act of March 20, 1933, repealed this law, but made provision for the continuation of the emergency officers' retirement pay under certain conditions, among which are the following: First, that such officer was employed in the active commissioned service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918; second, that the disease or injury, or aggravation of the disease or injury, on account of which retirement benefits were being paid directly resulted from the performance of military or naval duty during such service; third, that such persons must otherwise meet the requirements of the Veterans' Regulations, issued under the provisions of the act of March 20, 1933.

PART IV

HOSPITAL AND DOMICILIARY CARE AND OTHER BENEFITS

DOMICILIARY OR HOSPITAL CARE, INCLUDING MEDICAL TREATMENT

The Veterans' Administration is authorized to furnish domiciliary or hospital care, including medical treatment, within the limits of its facilities, to persons who served in the armed forces of the United States and are in need of such care, and under the conditions hereinafter enumerated.

The term "its facilities", as used when referring to the granting of hospital or domiciliary care, means those facilities of the Veterans' Administration; those other Government institutions under contract with the Veterans' Administration; those private institutions under contract either for the care of veterans with certain service-connected disabilities, for the care of woman veterans of any war, or for the care of veterans in the United States, Territories, and possessions.

Admissions to Veterans' Administration facilities are granted the following classes of applicants in the specified order of preference:

(1) Hospital treatment for (a) veterans who served during the period of any war who are honorably discharged from their last period of war service and who are suffering with injuries or diseases incurred in or aggravated in line of duty in the active military or naval service and are in need of hospital treatment for such injuries or diseases; and (b) persons who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the active military or naval forces and who were provisionally accepted and directed or ordered to report to a place for final acceptance into such military service, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, were drafted and after reporting pursuant to the call of the local draft board and prior to rejection, or who on or after April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, after being called into the Federal service as members of the National Guard but before being enrolled for the Federal service suffered injury or disease in line of duty and not the result of their own misconduct, for which they are receiving disability compensation and for which they are in need of hospital treatment.

(2) Hospital treatment for persons who were honorably discharged from the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty, or are in receipt of pension for a service-connected disability, and who are suffering with injuries or diseases which were incurred or aggravated in the active service and are in need of hospital treatment for such injuries or diseases.

(3) Hospital or domiciliary care, including emergency or extensive hospital treatment, for veterans who served during a period of war who (a) have an honorable discharge from their last period of war service; (b) served in the active military or naval service for 90 days or more, or who, having so served for less than 90 days, were discharged for disability incurred in line of duty; (c) are suffering with a permanent disability, tuberculous or neuropsychiatric ailment, or such other conditions requiring emergency or extensive hospital treatment; and (d) are incapacitated from earning a living and have no adequate means of support.

(4) Hospital or domiciliary care, including emergency or extended hospital treatment, for persons honorably discharged from their last period of active military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps—or honorably discharged from their last period of service in the United States Coast Guard—for disability incurred in line of duty or who are in receipt of pension for service-connected disability; who are suffering with a permanent disability or tuberculous or neuropsychiatric ailment, or such other conditions requiring emergency or extensive hospital treatment; and who are incapacitated from earning a living and have no adequate means of support.

(5) Hospital or domiciliary care for veterans who served regardless of length of service during a period of war who (a) were not dishonorably discharged from their last period of war service; (b) swear that they are unable to defray the expenses of hospitalization or domiciliary care, including the expense of transportation to and from a Veterans' Administration facility; and (c) are suffering with a disability, disease, or defect which, being susceptible of cure or decided improvement, indicates need for hospital care, or which, being essentially chronic in type and not susceptible of cure or decided improvement by hospital care, is producing disablement of such degree and of such probable persistency as will incapacitate from earning a living for a prospective period, and thereby indicates need for domiciliary care.

(6) Hospital treatment for retired officers and enlisted men of the United States Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard—Regular Establishment—who served in a period of war and who are suffering with a disease or injury for which hospital treatment is needed. This class of persons can be furnished hospital treatment only in those facilities referred to. The term "period of war" means the Spanish-American War, Philippine Insurrection, or Boxer Rebellion, as defined on page 4215 hereof; the World War, as defined on page 4216 hereof, or any war prior to the Spanish-American War. (See "Retired Officers and Enlisted Men".)

Application for Domiciliary or Hospital Care (V. A. Form P-10) should be executed by the applicant or nearest relative, guardian, or representative and forwarded to the nearest Veterans' Administration facility. If the veteran is found to be eligible for admission he will be promptly notified, and if he cannot be admitted the veteran will be so informed and the reason stated.

TRANSPORTATION

Provided prior authority is granted by the Veterans' Administration, transportation may be supplied at Government expense to those applicants accepted for hospital treatment of service-connected diseases or injuries and to applicants for hospitalization or domiciliary care, making a sworn statement on the application (V. A. Form P-10) that they are unable to defray transportation expenses. When such a veteran is regularly discharged from hospitalization or domiciliary care, return transportation to the place from which he entered the facility (or to some other point if no additional expense is included) may be supplied by the Veterans' Administration.

CLOTHING

Veterans who are receiving domiciliary or hospital care in Veterans' Administration facilities may be supplied with clothing at Government expense or may have it altered or repaired when both of the following conditions are met:

(1) When necessary for the protection of health or for sanitary reasons, and

(2) When the beneficiary is in receipt of less than $10 per month from any source, or the manager of the facility previously authorizes the clothing, repairs, or alterations because of some special need in an individual case.

PROSTHETIC APPLIANCES

Artificial limbs and prosthetic appliances may be furnished during hospitalization under the following conditions:

(1) When the disability requiring an artificial limb or appliance is service-connected.

(2) When required as adjunct to a service-connected disability.

(3) When the condition for which hospitalized, itself requires a prosthetic appliance or is associated with another disease or injury necessitating such appliance.

When receiving domiciliary care, artificial limbs and orthopedic and prosthetic appliances, including necessary repairs and clothing made necessary by the wearing of such appliances, will be furnished when required as an incident to the care or treatment furnished.

RETIRED OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN

In accordance with the practice of hospitals of the United States Army and Navy, retired officers and enlisted men who are furnished hospital treatment by the Veterans' Administration will be charged a per diem rate for such treatment to cover the cost of subsistence. The rate per day is as follows:

When under treatment for tuberculosis, $1.50 for retired officers and $1 per day for retired enlisted men.

When receiving treatment for general medical or surgical disabilities or psychoses, $1 per day for retired officers and 65 cents a day for retired enlisted men.

OUT-PATIENT TREATMENT

Veterans whose disabilities are connected with their military service may in addition to hospitalization and domiciliary care receive out-patient, medical, surgical, and dental services for their service-connected diseases or injuries. Treatment may be given at a Veterans' Administration facility or regional office, or be authorized to be given by a physician or dentist in the applicant's home community and, where necessary, treatment may be authorized at the applicant's place of residence.

No application form is required to secure treatment for a service-connected condition, but request for the treatment should be addressed to the appropriate field office of the Veterans' Administration.

Persons adjudged in need of and authorized to report for out-patient medical, surgical, or dental services may be furnished transportation and necessary meal and lodging requests.

BURIAL OF VETERANS WHO DIE WHILE RECEIVING DOMICILIARY OR HOSPITAL CARE

The bodies of beneficiaries who die while receiving domiciliary or hospital care in Veterans' Administration facilities may be transported at Government expense to the place of residence or to the nearest national cemetery or to such other place as the next of kin may direct where the expense so incurred is not greater than the ascertained cost of transportation to place of residence. When the ascertained cost of transportation to a place directed by the next of kin exceeds the cost to place of residence, the amount it would have cost to place of residence is available for reimbursement or partial payment. Burial in a national cemetery may be permitted only when the deceased veteran was honorably discharged from his last period of military or naval service.

Exclusive of cost of transportation, the maximum allowance for burial and funeral expenses, including preparation of the body, is $100. Not to exceed $100 will be allowed for a local burial, including all necessary services; and not to exceed $80 for the casket, embalming, and clothing will be allowed when the body is shipped. The remaining $20 is available for secondary services and expense at the place of interment. If it is found impossible to secure the necessary services within the $80 limitation, the central office in Washington may authorize an expenditure of a sum not to exceed $100.

PAYMENT OF BURIAL EXPENSES OF DECEASED WAR VETERANS

For the purpose of paying burial, funeral, and transportation expenses incurred in behalf of deceased veterans, the term "veteran of any war" includes the following persons:

Civil War: An honorably discharged member of the active military or naval service of the United States who served during the Civil War subsequent to April 11, 1861, and prior to May 27, 1865, including those persons who served as members of State organizations participating in the Civil War, for whose services the State has been reimbursed by the United States Government, and including any person who, at the time of his death, was receiving a pension as a veteran of the Civil War.

Indian Wars: A veteran of any Indian War, or a person who, at the time of his death, was receiving a pension in accordance with the provisions of the laws governing the payment of a pension as a veteran of an Indian war.

Spanish-American War: An honorably discharged officer or enlisted man who was in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after April 21, 1898, and before August 13, 1898, including those women who served as Army nurses under contract during this period, and including any honorably discharged person who served in the military or naval service of the United States between August 13, 1898, and July 4, 1902, both dates inclusive, and who left the continental United States under orders for military or naval service in Guam, Cuba, or Puerto Rico between such dates.

Philippine Insurrection: An honorably discharged officer or enlisted man employed in the active military or naval service of the United States who actually participated in the Philippine Insurrection on or after August 13, 1898, and before July 5, 1902, including those women who served as nurses under contract during this period, except that if the person was serving in the United States military forces engaged in hostilities in the Moro Province the ending date is July 15, 1903.

Boxer Rebellion: An honorably discharged officer or enlisted man employed in the active military or naval service of the United States who actually participated in the Boxer Rebellion on or after June 20, 1900, and before May 13, 1901, including those women who served as Army nurses under contract.

World War: An honorably discharged officer, enlisted man, member of the Army Nurse Corps (female), Navy Nurse Corps (female), who was employed in the active military or naval service of the United States on or after April 6, 1917, and before November 12, 1918: Provided, however, That if the person was serving in the United States military forces in Russia the dates herein are extended to April 1, 1920.

When an honorably discharged veteran of any war or a veteran of any war in receipt of compensation or pension dies, the Veterans' Administration may pay for burial and funeral expenses and transportation of the body (including preparation of the body) to place of burial a sum not exceeding $100, providing the veteran's net assets at the time of death, exclusive of debts and accrued pension, accrued compensation, or accrued insurance due at death, do not equal or exceed the sum of $1000. No deduction will be made from the sum allowed because of any contribution toward the burial and funeral (including transportation) which is made by a State, county, or other political subdivision, lodge, union, fraternal organization, society or beneficial organization, insurance company, workman's compensation commission, State industrial accident board, or employer, but the aggregate of the sums from all sources should not exceed the actual cost of the burial and funeral (including transportation).

No payment or reimbursement for burial, funeral, and transportation expenses can be allowed unless a claim therefor is filed within 1 year subsequent to the veteran's death and perfected within 6 months from the date the Veterans' Administration requests supporting evidence.

Claim for reimbursement of burial, funeral, and transportation expenses of deceased veterans should be made on V. A. Form P-91 and sent to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

BURIAL FLAGS

Burial flags may be issued by any county-seat post office or field office of the Veterans' Administration on application made on V. A. Form 2008 by relatives or undertakers who desire to secure an American flag with which to drape the casket of an honorably discharged veteran, and afterward will be given to the next of kin. Flags will not be issued subsequent to the burial of the deceased except where circumstances rendered it impossible for relatives or the undertaker to secure a flag to drape the casket and then only to the widow, child, or parent. In such event full explanation must appear upon the application form 2008. Reimbursement will not be made for burial flags privately purchased by relatives, friends, or other parties, nor will flags be issued to undertakers, organizations, or individuals to replace flags loaned or donated by them.

INSURANCE

During the World War, in order to give every commissioned officer and enlisted man, including Army and Navy nurses, in the military or naval forces of the United States greater protection for themselves and their dependents, the United States upon application and without medical examination granted insurance against the death or total permanent disability of any such person in any multiple of $500 and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000. This insurance, known as yearly renewable term insurance, war-risk insurance, was taken by the vast majority of World War veterans. This insurance ceased on July 2, 1927, except when death or total and permanent disability had occurred before that date and in some few additional instances.

Officers and enlisted men now entering the active service under the War or Navy Department or Coast Guard are entitled to apply for insurance in multiples of $500, not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, within 120 days from date of enlistment or entrance into the active service and before retirement, discharge, or resignation. Reserve officers on active duty for 16 days or more may apply for Government life insurance within 120 days from entrance upon active duty and before release from such duty.

Total-disability insurance, providing for the payment of benefits in the event the insured is totally disabled as the result of disease or injury for a period of 4 consecutive months or more, may be included with any of the plans of insurance provided, upon application, proof of good health satisfactory to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and the payment of the necessary premium. This additional insurance may also be included in policies now in force, and is independent of any disability clauses contained in such policies.

Veterans of the World War who served in the military and naval forces of the United States at any time from October 6, 1917, to July 2, 1921, who have heretofore applied or been eligible to apply for yearly renewable term—war-risk—insurance, or United States Government life—converted—insurance may now be granted insurance in multiples of $500, not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, upon application, proof of good health satisfactory to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and payment of the required premium. The maximum amount of insurance available is $10,000, including any amount now in force or previously surrendered for cash, or paid-up insurance.

If application is made for Government insurance within 120 days after the applicant enters the service, no medical examination is required. Veterans of the World War applying for Government insurance must undergo a complete medical examination. This applies also to all applicants for the total-disability insurance.

There are seven different plans of insurance provided by the Government: Ordinary life, 20- and 30-payment life, 20- and 30-year endowment, endowment at age 62, and 5-year level premium term insurance. The policies participate in dividends and the premiums are based on the net rate and do not include any extra charge to cover the cost of administration and no additional premium is charged for the total permanent disability benefits, which feature is not limited as to the age when total permanent disability may occur.

United States Government life insurance is free from restrictions as to residence, travel, occupation, military or naval service; further, an insured may designate any person, firm, corporation or legal entity as the beneficiary under his policy, either individually or as trustee.

There is no legal reserve level premium participating insurance, providing equal benefits with an equal guaranty of safety, offered at a premium rate as low as the Government rate.

Additional information and application forms may be obtained from the Veterans' Administration at Washington, D. C.

WORLD WAR ADJUSTED COMPENSATION WORLD WAR ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION ACT

Under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act any veteran, except as hereinafter indicated, who was a member of the military or naval forces of the United States, any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918, who was honorably discharged, may be entitled to an adjusted-service certificate. The amount of the adjusted-service certificate is based upon the age of the veteran at the date of issuance and the amount of the adjusted-service credit. In computing the adjusted-service credit an allowance was made of $1.25 for each day of overseas service, and $1 for each day of home service in excess of 60 days in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, but the total amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no overseas service cannot exceed $500 and the amount of credit for a veteran who performed any overseas service cannot exceed $625. In computing the credit no allowance is made to any commissioned officer above the rank of captain in the Army or Marine Corps, lieutenant in the Navy, first lieutenant in the Coast Guard, or past assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service, or any person who received the pay or allowances of any officer superior in rank to any of such grades, or to any commissioned or warrant officer performing home service not with troops and receiving commutation of quarters or subsistence for the period of such service; or to members of the S. A. T. C., cadets of the United States Military or Coast Guard Academies, or midshipmen at the Naval Academy. The time granted individuals for farm furloughs and other purposes is not counted in computing the service credit.

Where the amount of the adjusted-service credit amounts to $50 or less the veteran is entitled to receive that sum in adjusted-service pay, that is, cash. If the amount is greater than $50 the veteran may receive an adjusted-service certificate.

Application for adjusted-service certificates or adjusted-service pay should be made to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, depending upon the branch in which the veteran served, and should be made on or before January 2, 1940, on Form W. W. C. 1.

The adjusted-service certificates are essentially 20-year-endowment insurance policies, the face value of which is found by increasing the amount of the individual's adjusted-service credit by 25 percent and determining the amount of 20-year endowment insurance that amount would purchase at his age on the birthday nearest the date of the certificate if applied as a single net premium with interest of 4 percent compounded annually.

Upon the death of a veteran who has not applied for settlement under the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936, the beneficiary should apply to the Veterans' Administration for the proceeds of the certificate, using V. A. Form 582.

If a veteran died before making application for an adjusted-service certificate, or, if entitled to receive adjusted-service pay, has died after making application but before he has received payment of the adjusted-service pay, then the amount of his adjusted-service credit is payable in 10 equal quarterly installments to his dependents in the following order of preference:

1. To the unmarried widow, if otherwise entitled.
2. If no widow entitled to payment, then to the children under the age of 18 at the time of the veteran's death, or incapable of self-support by reason of mental or physical defect prior to January 2, 1940, share and share alike.
3. If no widow or children entitled to payment, then to the dependent mother.
4. If no widow, children, or mother entitled to payment, then to the dependent father.

No other person, not even a brother or sister, is eligible to receive it.

Application should be made to the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy upon Form W. W. C. 1.

ADJUSTED COMPENSATION PAYMENT ACT, 1936

Under the act of January 27, 1936, veterans who have been issued adjusted-service certificates may exchange them for bonds of the United States in $50 denominations with a value up to the face amount of their adjusted-service certificates, less any loans which have been made thereon and any interest on such loans up to October 1, 1931. Any unpaid interest which has accrued after October 1, 1931, is forgiven or canceled. No provision is made, however, for refunding any interest which has been paid. Odd amounts over and above the highest multiple of $50 in the amount due on the certificate will be paid by check.

The United States bonds with which the adjusted-service certificates will be redeemed are not of the ordinary type, but have several unusual features which make them extremely valuable. They may be redeemed at any time at their face value, but if held for 1 year from the date of issue they may be redeemed at any time thereafter not only at their face value but, in addition, 3-percent interest annually. Thus, holders of these bonds are fully protected against any fluctuation in value. They are nontransferable, nonassignable, are not subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any proceedings, and the veteran is assured of getting the money himself. No one can take these bonds from him.

Bonds will be dated June 15, 1936, and will run to June 15, 1945. Bonds will be redeemable by the United States Treasury at such places, including post offices, as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate.

Application for payment: Application for payment of adjusted-service certificates by these bonds should be made on V. A. Form 1701. Application forms are available throughout the country at the various offices of the Veterans' Administration and at posts or other comparable units of the various service organizations. Applications for exchanging the adjusted-service certificates for bonds may be filed anytime prior to the date of the maturity of the certificate, but if the veteran has not applied for the certificate his application must be made before January 2, 1940.

Veterans who have loans outstanding against their certificates should send their applications to the office from which the outstanding loan was made. Veterans who have made loans from banks should send their applications to the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C. Veterans who have no outstanding loans upon their certificates should send their applications, together with certificates, to the Veterans' Administration regional office or facility with regional office activities nearest the place of their residence. Veterans who are mentally incompetent should have the application made in their behalf by a legally authorized representative.

If a veteran dies after he has made out application (form 1701) for payment of his adjusted-service certificate but before the application has been filed, the application may be filed by any person, and if it is filed before payment is made to the beneficiary named in the adjusted-service certificate, it will constitute a valid application for payment in bonds.

If a veteran dies after he has made and filed his application (form 1701), payment will not be made to the beneficiary named in the adjusted-service certificate but will be made to the estate of the veteran.

The veteran who has not applied for an adjusted-service certificate and who desires to obtain settlement under the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936, with payment in Government bonds, should use application Form WWC 1 and send it to the War or Navy Departments, Washington, D. C., depending upon whether he served in the Army or Navy. He should take no further action until he is informed by the War or Navy Department or the Veterans' Administration of the action taken on his application.

If the veteran is entitled to an adjusted-service certificate, it will be mailed to him by the Veterans' Administration, and if the veteran desires to obtain the bonds, he should properly execute application form 1701, attach the certificate to the application, and forward both to the office of the Veterans' Administration facility having regional office activities, nearest the place of his residence.

When the veteran has a guardian, custodian, or conservator, and it is desired to apply for settlement, the fingerprints of the veteran must be placed upon the application (form 1701) when this is possible. The fingerprints of the guardian or other representative of the veteran would be of no value in establishing the veteran's identity.

Exemption from attachment, etc.: A sum payable under the Adjusted-Compensation Act, or the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936, the proceeds of any loan, and the bonds received in settlement of an adjusted-service certificate are not subject to attachment, levy, or seizure, or to National or State taxation, and are exempt from the claims of creditors.

PENSION OR COMPENSATION FOR DISABILITY OR DEATH RESULTING FROM TRAINING, HOSPITALIZATION OR MEDICAL OR SURGICAL TREATMENT

Where any veteran is suffering or has suffered from an injury or the aggravation of any existing injury as the result of training, hospitalization, or medical or surgical treatment or as the result of having submitted to an examination under authority of the War Risk Insurance Act, or the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, and not the result of his own misconduct, he may be awarded compensation or pension in the same manner as if such disability, aggravation, or death was connected with his military service.

Application for benefits under this paragraph must be made on V. A. Form 526a within 2 years after the injury, aggravation, or death occurred, or within 2 years after March 28, 1934, whichever is the later date.

COMPENSATION, PENSION, OR RETIREMENT PAY DUE AND UNPAID AT DEATH

When any person receiving compensation, pension, or emergency officers' retirement pay dies, the balance not paid during his or her lifetime may be paid by the Veterans' Administration:

(1) Upon the death of a veteran, to the widow, and if there is no widow then to the child or children under the age of 18 at his death, except when the payments were being made under laws reenacted on August 13, 1935, by Public No. 269, Seventy-fourth Congress, or to a person who was receiving pension on account of service rendered prior to April 21, 1898.

(2) Upon the death of a widow, to her children under the age of 18 at her death, unless the payments were being made under laws reenacted on August 13, 1935, by Public No. 269, Seventy-fourth Congress, or to a person who was receiving pension on account of service rendered prior to April 21, 1898, in which event the balance is payable to the child or children under the age of 16, or unless payments were being made under Public No. 484, Seventy-fourth Congress, dated June 28, 1934.

(3) Upon the death of a person receiving an apportioned share of money payable to a veteran, to the veteran.

(4) If there are no survivors as indicated above, no payment may be made except as reimbursement of burial expenses and in some cases as reimbursement of expenses incurred during the last illness and burial.

Claims and evidence in support of claims for amounts due under any laws reenacted on August 13, 1935, or on account of service rendered prior to April 21, 1898, may be filed at any time, but claims other than these must be filed within 1 year from the death of the person entitled and evidence in support of such claims must be submitted within 6 months after the Veterans' Administration requests it. Claims filed under laws reenacted on August 13, 1935, or based upon service prior to April 21, 1898, which were pending at the time of death, may be completed and any amounts due thereunder paid as accrued pension. Additional information and application forms may be obtained from the Veterans' Administration, Washington, D. C.

APPEALS

Claimants may appeal from a decision rendered in any claim (except in those claims involving simultaneously contested claims) within 1 year from the date of the mailing of the notice of the result of the initial review or determination. Appeals, or application for review, as they are known, must be filed with the office which made the denial. If no application for review or appeal is filed within 1 year, the action taken on the initial review or determination will become final and the claim will not thereafter be reopened except upon the basis of new and material evidence. When a veteran appeals he is allowed 1 year for the perfection of his appeal. Any application for review on appeal filed with the office which made the denial and which is postmarked prior to the expiration of the 1-year period will be accepted as having been filed within the time limit.

In simultaneously contested claims (e. g., where husband or wife contends that desertion has or has not occurred) where one is allowed and one rejected, the time allowed for filing application is 60 days instead of 1 year from the date of mailing notice. In such cases all parties other than the applicant, whose interest may be adversely affected by the decision will be notified and allowed 30 days from the date of the mailing of such notice within which to file a brief or argument in answer thereto.

Application for review on appeal must be made in writing by the claimant, his legal guardian, or such accredited representative or authorized agent as may be selected by him, but not more than one recognized organization or agent will be recognized at any one time in the prosecution of a claim. The application must clearly identify the benefits sought and should contain specific assignments of the alleged statements of facts or errors of law in the adjudication of the claim.

EVIDENCE—PROOF OF RELATIONSHIP, DEATH, ETC.

As a prerequisite to the obtaining of benefits under laws pertaining to veterans and their dependents a proper application or claim must be filed with the Veterans' Administration unless otherwise provided. All questions on the application form must be clearly and completely answered. If the answer is not known, the applicant should so state, and if more space is required, blank paper should be used and attached to the application form. Accompanying the form should be a copy of the veteran's discharge and any affidavits or other papers necessary by reason of the nature of the claim made.

Proof of marriage: Proof of marriage should be shown by the best evidence obtainable, as stated below in the order of importance:

1. By duly certified copy of the public or church record of marriage; or
2. If not obtainable, a statement of the reason for the non-production and the affidavit of the clergyman or magistrate who officiated; or
3. If such affidavit is not procurable, by the production of the original marriage certificate accompanied by proof of its genuineness and the authority of the person to perform the marriage; or
4. By the affidavit of two or more eye witnesses to the ceremony.

In jurisdictions where common-law marriages are recognized, proof may be made by affidavit of one or both parties to the marriage, if living, supplemented by affidavits of two or more witnesses who know that the parties lived together as husband and wife and were so recognized, and stating how long to their knowledge such relationship continued, and so forth. Since the laws of the State in which the marriage was consummated governs, all marriages must be proved valid according to the law of such State.

Proof of birth: To prove the birth or date of birth of an individual, a certified copy of the public record of birth or church record of baptism, certified to by the legal custodian of such records, should be obtained. If neither of these records is obtainable, the reason for its nonproduction should be stated and an affidavit secured from the physician or midwife in attendance at the birth, or the affidavits of two or more disinterested persons who should state their ages, and the name, date, and place of birth of the person whose birth or age is being established, and that from their own knowledge the person is the child of such parents, naming the parents.

Proof of death: Proof of death should be established by producing:

A copy of the public record of the State or community in which death occurred, certified to by the custodian of such records or by a duly certified copy of a coroner's report of death, or by verdict of a coroner's jury of the State or community where death occurred, provided such report properly identifies the deceased. If this evidence is not obtainable, the reason must be stated. The fact of death may be established by the affidavit of a person having personal knowledge thereof and who viewed the body of the deceased and knew it to be the body of the person whose identity is being established, setting forth all the facts and circumstances concerning the death, including the place, date, time, and cause thereof.

In adjusted-compensation cases and pension where the cause of death is not a factor, and where satisfactory evidence is produced establishing the fact of the continued and unexplained absence from his home and family for a period of 7 years during which period no intelligence of his existence has been received, the death of such individual as of the date of the expiration of such period may be accepted as sufficiently proved.

Affidavits: To be of value an affidavit should clearly and concisely set forth the facts sought to be proved. The use of legal headings and phraseology should be avoided unless prepared by an attorney. If the affiant is a layman, have him set forth the facts as simply as possible, in chronological order, and with due regard to any necessary details. All affidavits from physicians should state whether the evidence is furnished from office records or from memory. Such affidavits should specifically show the symptoms and findings rather than merely a diagnosis, since the former are facts and the diagnosis is an opinion.

Foreign affidavits: Affidavits or other documents from foreign countries in which the United States has consular representatives must be executed before a United States consular officer in that country or by or before an official of that country having authority for that purpose. In the event the execution is by or before a foreign officer, the signature of that official must be authenticated either by the United States consular officer in that jurisdiction or by the Department of State, except that documents submitted through and approved by the Deputy Minister of Pensions and National Health, Ottawa, Canada, will be accepted without being authenticated in such manner.

Where there is no consular representative, the signature and seal of the official of the country may be authenticated by a diplomatic or consular officer of a friendly country, or the documents may be forwarded to the nearest American consul for a certificate concerning its authenticity.

GUARDIANSHIP

Guardianship is necessary:

1. When a Veterans' Administration beneficiary is under legal disability. In some instances when the sum payable is small and when family conditions are acceptable, arrangements may be made for payment of monetary benefits to a custodian.

2. When the veteran or other beneficiary is mentally incompetent the appropriate field office of the Veterans' Administration will furnish full instructions to interested relatives or friends in the event a guardian is needed.

DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION

All files, records, reports, and other papers and documents pertaining to any claim are confidential and no disclosures thereof can be made except:

1. To a claimant or duly authorized representative as to matters concerning himself alone when such disclosures would not be injurious to the physical or mental health of the claimant;

2. When required by process of a United States court to be produced in any suit or procedure;

3. When required by any agency of the United States Government;

4. In all proceedings in the nature of an inquest into the mental competency of a claimant;

5. In any judicial proceedings where such disclosure is deemed necessary and proper.

The amount of pension or compensation being paid may be made known to any person who applies for such information.

The address of a claimant is privileged and confidential and will not be disclosed except to duly constituted police or court officials upon proper request and the submission of a certified copy either of the indictment returned against the claimant or of the warrant issued for his arrest.

COPIES OF RECORDS

Any person entitled to and desiring a copy of any record in the custody of the Veterans' Administration should make written application to the Veterans' Administration office where the record is located, stating specifically the particular record, paper, and so forth, a copy of which is desired, whether certified or uncertified, and the purpose for which such copy is desired to be used. The approximate cost of such copies must accompany the application. The fees charged are:

	Cents
Written copies per 100 words.....	25
Photostat copies per sheet.....	25
Certifications.....	25

RECOGNITION OF ATTORNEYS, AGENTS, AND ORGANIZATIONS IN THE PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS

The Administrator is authorized to recognize representatives of the American Red Cross, the American Legion, the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, the Grand Army of the Republic, the United States Spanish War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and such other organizations as he may from time to time approve to present claims. Any organization desiring recognition must agree and certify that neither the organization nor its representatives will charge a claimant any fee or compensation for its services. The organization must submit a copy of its constitution or charter and bylaws, together with a written statement setting forth the manner in which ex-service men and their dependents would be benefited by such recognition.

The form of application for recognition is V. A. Form P-21.

Before an organization may be recognized in an individual claim there must be filed with the Veterans' Administration a form duly executed by the claimant and specifically conferring upon the organization the authority to represent the claimant in the presentation of the claim and to receive any information in connection therewith. The form used for this purpose is V. A. Form P-22.

The organizations recognized in the presentation of claims make no charge for their services and do not limit their assistance to their members. The Veterans' Administration in its central office and in its regional offices and facilities throughout the country employs skilled persons whose duties are to assist claimants in the preparation and presentation of their claims. While it has long been recognized that a claimant should not be denied the right to employ his own attorney or agent to assist him, and while the laws and Veterans' Regulations provide for the payment of fees under certain limitations, it is not necessary for any person to incur any expense for services in the preparation and presentation of claims under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration.

Any person who is an attorney at law in good standing, or any competent person who is not an attorney at law, may, if not prohibited by law, be admitted to practice as a pension attorney or pension-claims agent, respectively, provided he is a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become a citizen and is of good moral character and in good repute. Before any person admitted to practice as an attorney or agent can represent a claimant there must be filed with the Veterans' Administration a duly executed power of attorney.

The power of attorney must be signed by the claimant or his guardian in the presence of two witnesses, neither of whom is the agent or attorney, and be acknowledged before an officer duly authorized to administer oaths for general purposes. No paper in a claim can be executed before the attorney therein without resulting in the forfeiture of the attorneyship rights.

Relatives or friends of a claimant may, at the written request of the claimant, be recognized to represent gratuitously the claimant in a specified case.

BENEFITS NOT SUBJECT TO TAXATION OR SEIZURE, ACT OF AUGUST 12, 1935

Payments of benefits due or to become due are not assignable, and such payments made to, or on account of, a beneficiary under any of the laws relating to veterans are exempt from taxation, are exempt from the claims of creditors, and are not liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable process whatever, either before or after receipt by the beneficiary. This provision does not attach to claims of the United States, nor does the exemption as to taxation extend to any property purchased in part or wholly out of such payments. This act does not prohibit the assignment by any person, to whom converted insurance may be payable under title III of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, of his interest in such insurance to any other member of the permitted class of beneficiaries.

PART V

INFORMATION CONCERNING VETERANS' PREFERENCE TO FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYMENT, BURIAL IN NATIONAL CEMETERIES, HEADSTONES, AND BENEFITS GIVEN BY STATES

VETERANS' PREFERENCE FOR FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE EMPLOYMENT

Preference, according to present laws and Executive orders governing, does not apply to the unclassified service but only to the classified. Preference is granted in connection with unclassified laborer positions where labor regulations apply, but under special regulations approved by the President, and preference is granted by Executive order of July 12, 1933, to persons taking examinations for Presidential postmasterships, which positions also are not in the classified service.

Preference, according to present laws and orders, is not limited to veterans, their widows, or the wives of disabled veterans of any war or because of wartime service. Preference is also granted to all veterans, including peacetime veterans, their widows, and the wives of veterans disabled because of service-connected disabilities.

Preference in examination, rating, and appointment

The statutory provision is covered in the deficiency act approved July 11, 1919 (41 Stat. 37), which provides as follows:

That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines, who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions.

The Executive orders of March 3, 1923, March 2, 1929, April 24, 1931, and January 18, 1932, stipulate and define benefits granted to veterans pursuant to the act of July 11, 1919. The benefits are as follows:

(1) Veterans are given five points in addition to their earned rating and need only earn a rating of 65, the five points giving them a total rating of 70, all that is necessary to have their names entered on the register.

(2) Disabled veterans (having present existence of a service-connected disability), the widows of veterans, and the wives of veterans who because of service-connected disability are themselves not qualified, are granted 10 points and need only earn a rating of 60, a total rating of 70 being all that is necessary to have their names entered on the register, their names being placed above all others on the register.

(3) A veteran to establish disability preference must show that it is service-connected and of present existence. This is done through the official records of the Veterans' Administration and also of the War or Navy Department or of the Coast Guard.

(4) Veterans over 55 years of age in claiming disability preference, whether service-connected or not by reason that they draw pension or compensation under existing laws, must furnish a statement from the Veterans' Administration showing that they are entitled to pension or compensation. Wives of such veterans who claim preference due to their husband's disability must furnish such evidence.

(5) In examinations where experience is an element of qualification, time spent in the service of the United States during the War with Spain or the World War is credited where the applicant's actual employment in a similar vocation to that for which he is applying was interrupted by such military or naval service but was resumed after discharge.

(6) Persons granted preference may be released from age limitations by regulations of the United States Civil Service Commission with the approval of the proper appointing officer, except for positions of policeman and fireman of the District of Columbia and those established by the retirement law.

(7) Physical requirements may be waived by the United States Civil Service Commission in the case of a disabled veteran.

(8) Height and weight requirements may be waived in the case of a person granted preference, except for policeman, guard, and watchman, private in the District of Columbia fire department, game warden, traveling hospital attendant, assistant lay inspector, and any other position in connection with which the examination announcement specifies the height or weight, or both.

(9) Persons granted preference are certified without regard to apportionment in the apportioned departmental service at Washington, D. C.

(10) Quarterly examinations are held for the benefit of persons entitled to 10-point preference (disability preference), for which there are existing registers of eligibles, maintained by the United States Civil Service Commission, the names of these 10-point preference eligibles being entered at the head of the existing registers along with those of other such eligibles. This does not apply to examinations for Presidential postmasterships.

(11) The name of a preference eligible on a register may not be passed over by the appointing officer and a person not granted preference selected with the same or lower rating unless the United States Civil Service Commission is furnished with a statement as to reasons for so doing.

(12) Former classified employees entitled to preference in appointment may be reinstated without time limit.

NOTE.—(a) According to special regulations approved by the President, the names of veterans, their widows, and wives of veterans disqualified by injuries received in service and line of duty are placed at the head of unskilled-labor registers in the order of their earned ratings. Eligibility for reinstatement to an unskilled-laborer position is without time limit in the case of a person entitled to preference.

(b) The Executive order of July 12, 1933, which authorized the holding of examinations for Presidential postmasterships grants five points for addition to earned ratings, whereupon certification is in accordance with relative standing thus acquired, in the cases of veterans of the World War, of the Spanish American War, or of the Philippine Insurrection; age limitations are waived for such candidates, and the time they were in service during such wars may be reckoned in making up required length of business experience. Five points also are given to their widows or their wives if they are disqualified on account of service-connected disability or if they are over 55 and are entitled to pension or compensation because of disability.

Preference in reduction of force

Statutory provision is covered in act of August 23, 1912 (37 Stat. 413), which provides in part:

That in the event of reductions being made in the force in any of the executive departments no honorably discharged soldier or sailor whose record in said department is rated good shall be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary.

The Executive order of March 3, 1923, provides that an employee entitled to military preference in appointment shall not be discharged or dropped or reduced in rank or salary when a reduction in force is being made if his record is good, or (further provided by Executive order of Mar. 21, 1929) if his efficiency rating is equal to that of any employee in competition with him who is retained in the service. In making selections, according to competition, grade and character of work are considered.

NOTE.—Under section 213 of the act of June 30, 1932 (Economy Act), a veteran whose spouse is also in the service of the United States or of the District of Columbia, would in the event of a reduction in force be dismissed before employees who are not married, or whose husbands or wives are not in the service. The act of June 30, 1932, takes precedence over veteran-preference laws in conflict with its provisions. To this extent, preference status as a veteran is nullified. Likewise, the act of June 30, 1932, nullifies preference status in connection with appointment.

BENEFITS GIVEN BY STATES

In addition to the various benefits granted by the Federal Government, the veterans may be entitled to additional benefits from the State in which they live. Some States maintain homes and hospitals for veterans of the State. Some grant pensions. Many have passed "bonus" bills granting veterans State bonuses. Some grant exemption from taxes or assist veterans by making loans for homes and farms. Preference in State civil-service appointments and on State work projects is generally given to veterans. All inquiries regarding State laws concerning veterans should be made to the field offices of the Veterans' Administration in the particular State or to the State service officer.

REGULATIONS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF NATIONAL CEMETERIESParagraph 90:

All officers, cadets, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue Cutter Service, and Army and Navy paymasters, clerks who died in the Regular or Volunteer service of the United States, or who died after having been mustered out or honorably discharged, are entitled to burial in any national cemetery free of cost. The same rights will be accorded to Army nurses who are honorably discharged or pensioned. The presentation of the commission, warrant, or honorable discharge of the deceased officer, enlisted man, or Army nurse, or the letter of appointment of the deceased Army or Navy paymaster clerk, signed by the Secretary of War or Navy, as the case may be is sufficient authority for the interment.

Paragraph 92:

If the honorable discharge is not available as evidence of service, the interment may be made upon presentation of a pension certificate. If neither an honorable discharge nor a pension certificate can be produced, superintendents will communicate with the Quartermaster General, by telegraph if immediate burial is desired, for verification of the alleged service.

Paragraph 97:

The deceased wife of a commissioned officer of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Revenue Cutter Service of the United States Regular or Volunteer forces may be interred prior to the death of her husband upon presentation of his commission signed by the President. This applies also to the wife of a warrant officer of the Navy, provided such warrant is signed by the President, but does not apply to the wife of a warrant officer of the Revenue Cutter Service, as such warrants are signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the rank of these men is assimilative with that of a noncommissioned officer of the Army. The wife of an Army or Navy paymaster's clerk, upon presentation of his letter of appointment signed by the Secretary of War or Navy, is entitled to the same benefits. If the commission, warrant, or letter of appointment is not available, the superintendent will communicate with the Quartermaster General by telegraph if immediate burial is desired, giving the name of the husband and the approximate date of the alleged services for verification, and await instructions. A petty officer of the Navy being an enlisted man, his wife will not be interred in a national cemetery until after the burial therein of her husband and then only in the same grave.

Paragraph 100:

The wife of an enlisted man may be interred in a national cemetery, but only after the burial therein of her husband and in the same grave. This applies to the wives of enlisted men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; to the wives of petty officers and those warrant officers of the Navy whose warrants are signed by the Secretary of the Navy; and to the wives of enlisted men and warrant officers of the Revenue Cutter Service whose warrants are signed by the Secretary of the Treasury. * * *

Paragraph 116:

The creation of private monuments, headstones, or footstones will not be permitted until both the proposed design and the inscription have been approved by the Quartermaster General.

Persons "discharged from draft" cannot be interred in national cemeteries. This class includes only those who were drafted for service, but for some reason were not accepted for military service.

HEADSTONES

Upon application to the Quartermaster General, United States Army, Washington, D. C., headstones will be furnished for unmarked graves of soldiers, sailors, marines, and Army nurses who served in the Army or Navy of the United States—including the Revolutionary War and service with the military forces of the Confederate States of America—whether regular or volunteer, and whether they died in the service or after muster out or honorable discharge. The headstones for Civil and Spanish War soldiers are of American white marble, 39 inches long, 12 inches wide, and 4 inches thick; for the World War, 42 inches long, 4 inches thick, and 13 inches wide. Headstones will be shipped freight prepaid by the Government, only to the nearest railroad station or steamboat landing.

POLITICS NOT A FACTOR

Any veteran may receive advice, counsel, and assistance in regard to his case by a representative who is paid by the Government, at every hospital and every regional office. The representative will help the veteran by suggesting the kind of evidence that will be necessary to assist him in his case, assist him in preparing all the necessary forms, and do such other things as may be necessary to the proper presentation of his case to the Veterans' Administration.

Many veterans ask the question: "I have submitted all the proof I can and have been turned down; what shall I do now?" Of course, every question involving expenditure of public funds must be determined by some person, court, board, or tribunal. Someone must have the responsibility of passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence presented to authorize the payment of public funds. It is the same way in regard to civil rights. If one brings suit against a person, firm, or corporation for damages to person or property, certain proof must be presented to the court and the jury in order to win. Although the injured person feels that he has presented sufficient proof, if the court or jury decides against him he can appeal his case, and if the higher courts affirm the judgment there is nothing further for him to do; he has lost. In a similar way, a veteran may appeal for review of his claim if he can show error in the decision, but once the Board of Veterans' Appeals has rendered its decision he cannot again have the case reviewed unless he can submit new and material evidence.

Pensions and benefits are made in accordance with actual laws and regulations and not through favoritism, "political pull", or other means.

HELPFUL QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Information under this heading obtained from American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, and Spanish-American War Veterans. (These questions are typical of those that are generally asked)

1. Q. How can I get a prompt reply to my letters to the Veterans' Administration?

A. In communicating with the Veterans' Administration be sure to include your claim number. If you do not remember your claim number, give enough information to identify yourself, such as your rank and organization, date of enlistment, date of discharge, and date and place of birth. (There are over 65,000 veterans listed in the Veterans' Administration with the name of Smith. There are over 5,000 John Smiths listed.)

2. Q. In case of the death of a veteran, what action should be taken by the widow?

A. The widow should immediately notify the regional office nearest home, enclosing with the letter a copy of the death certificate. She should also request information as to any rights she may have concerning compensation, adjusted compensation, and insurance. If there are minor children, the same questions should be asked concerning their rights.

3. Q. Is it too late to apply for compensation for disability incurred during the World War?

A. No. Application should be made to the office of the Veterans' Administration nearest the veteran's home, with a brief description of the disability and place of incurrence. Such a letter will bring the necessary information from the Veterans' Administration as to how to proceed.

4. Q. What war veterans who were not disabled in the service are entitled to hospitalization?

A. Any veteran of any war or military expedition, not dishonorably discharged, is entitled to free hospitalization in Government facilities provided he will certify that he is unable to meet the cost of such treatment. Hospitalization for non-service-connected disabilities is not a right which the veterans can claim or demand, but it is a privilege extended only when facilities are available.

5. Q. Are monetary benefits paid to any World War veterans other than those disabled in the war?

A. Yes. If the disability is not the result of misconduct and is rated permanent and total, the veteran is entitled to $30 per month, provided the veteran had 90 days' service and his annual income, if unmarried, does not exceed $1,000, or if married or with minor children does not exceed $2,500.

6. Q. When are increases in compensation granted?

A. When a medical examination conducted by the Veterans' Administration indicates increased disability. An informal application by the veteran supported by medical evidence is required before the Veterans' Administration can reexamine veterans not actually in Veterans' Administration hospitals.

7. Q. When are dependency allowances granted?

A. World War veterans receiving compensation for disabilities rated on a temporary basis only are entitled to additional allowances for established dependents. Veterans receiving permanent ratings are not entitled to dependency allowances.

8. Q. Will compensation or pension of a World War veteran be reduced during hospitalization in a Veterans' Administration hospital?

A. If a beneficiary upon entering a Veterans' Administration facility is found to be without dependents, his compensation cannot exceed $15 per month, or if receiving pension or peacetime monetary benefits, the maximum is $6 monthly.

9. Q. When a claim for monetary benefits is denied, what recourse is open to the veteran?

A. An appeal may be filed with the office denying the claim within 1 year from the date of receipt of denial. Only one appeal is allowed under existing law.

10. Q. Does a veteran have the right of representation in the prosecution of his claim?

A. Yes. The Disabled American Veterans, the American Red Cross, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the American Legion have skilled claims personnel to assist any beneficiary in the prosecution of claims for benefits. Their services are gratis.

11. Q. Where are appeals heard and decided?

A. All appeals are considered by the Board of Veterans' Appeals of the Veterans' Administration at Washington, D. C.

12. Q. Should I come to Washington on my appeal?

A. It has been generally accepted that personal appearances before appeals boards are not generally required or necessary. The expense for such travel must be borne by the person appealing. It is believed advisable for the appellant to be guided by the advice of the representative designated to handle the claims.

13. Q. Does the Government provide burial for deceased veterans?

A. Yes. Apply at nearest Veterans' Administration office, where full information can be obtained. Claim for reimbursement for burial must be made within 1 year of the death of the veteran.

14. Q. When is compensation apportioned?

A. When the established dependents of a veteran are living separate and apart from the veteran. The Veterans' Administration may apportion the monthly monetary benefits according to the circumstances as provided by regulations.

15. Q. Is a doctor's affidavit, setting forth his diagnosis alone, considered good evidence?

A. No. The doctor should set forth the dates of treatment, the diagnosis, and complete findings in support of the diagnosis. It is essential to set forth the findings, as they show an accurate diagnosis has been made; also, indicate the degree of disability, which is essential for rating purposes.

16. Q. Should a letter be addressed to the office that disburses compensation checks with reference to a claim?

A. No. Checks are made through the fiscal offices of the Treasury Department. Letters with reference to compensation and pension should be addressed to the office having claims file.

17. Q. Where should inquiries be made with reference to veterans' laws and benefits?

A. Communicate with the nearest Veterans' Administration office.

RENT COMMISSION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the proponents and opponents of the bill (H. R. 11563) declaring an emergency in the housing condition in the District of Columbia; creating a rent commission for the District of Columbia; prescribing powers and duties of the commission, and for other purposes, have come to the agreement that, as it is plainly evident this bill cannot be finished today, the bill shall be the unfinished business on the next District day, which is 3 weeks from today; that upon that day no time shall be extended for anything other than District business; that the filibustering carried on today shall not be continued and that the bill shall be discussed with 2 hours for general debate limited to the bill, one-half of which shall be controlled by the opponents and one-half by myself, after which it shall be read for amendment, and the House shall stay in session until a vote is had on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this agreement has been entered into by the opponents and the proponents of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, that is the agreement with the exception of two errors mentioned by the gentlewoman from New Jersey. One is her reference to a filibuster. First, nothing has been done in this House today except that which in accordance with the rules of the House may be done to stop a bad bill, and in the second place, there are 40 minutes of debate which the gentleman from Texas, myself, already controls under the rules of the House, which I duly reserved from the hour then allotted to me, and which I have promised to certain Members on the Democratic side of the House to be used by them in the debate against the bill, and it is understood that within the 2 hours limitation of time mentioned by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, 40 minutes shall be controlled by me to yield to the other Democratic Members referred to. This time I reserved under the rules of the House on the former District day when there was consideration of the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, how does the committee figure an agreement between the advocates and the opponents of this bill will be binding upon the membership of the House?

Mr. BLANTON. The agreement has to do only with the chairman and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] on the one side, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and myself, who have been pursuing our rights under the rules of the House in doing everything possible to defeat this bad bill, and binds only us, the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN]. Of course, we cannot bind other Members, but we are binding ourselves by this agreement.

Mr. COX. Is it expected to try to bind those who are not within this exclusive circle?

Mr. BLANTON. No; of course not, except as to limiting the time for debate, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself have been pursuing our rights as Representatives under our oath of office, and under the rules of the House, in doing everything within our power to prevent this unconstitutional, bad bill from passing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request as the Chair now understands it.

The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11563) be now laid aside for consideration on next District day, which will be 3 weeks from today, and that general debate shall be limited to 2 hours, when the bill is taken up, one-half to be controlled by herself and one-half by the opposition.

Mr. BLANTON. With the understanding that 40 minutes of the hour in opposition I have already reserved and it is mine to yield to other Members, under the rules of the House, and the other 20 minutes will be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from Illinois having already been heard in debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the time be fixed now so there will be no misunderstanding about it.

Mr. BLANTON. That was the understanding we had, because I have reserved to me 40 minutes from the last District Day, and I have promised to yield it to Democratic Members on my side of the aisle in debate against the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—

The SPEAKER. Let us get the unanimous-consent agreement clearly in mind now.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, the allotment of time suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is perfectly agreeable. Forty minutes of time remains to the gentleman from Texas and 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The SPEAKER. Does that mean 40 minutes in addition to the 2 hours?

Mrs. NORTON. No; 1 hour, in all, for the opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11563) be laid aside for consideration on next District day, 3 weeks from today, and at that time general debate shall be limited to 2 hours, 1 hour to be controlled by herself, 40 minutes by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Reserving the right to object, the request was that the opposition should control one-half of the time. I am opposed to the bill, and I think one-half of the time should be controlled by the minority.

The SPEAKER. The request was that the lady from New Jersey should control one-half of the time, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], 40 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. The reason for that was that on the former District day, when this bill was last considered, I was recognized by the Chairman for 1 hour. I used 20 minutes and reserved the balance of my time. I have that 40 minutes of time allotted to me, and I have promised to yield it to my Democratic colleagues who desire to speak against this bill, and the chairman of the committee has recognized my right, and I could not be deprived of it unless she were to pass a motion to have the time controlled by another.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Further reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the time allotted for the minority. I am opposed to the bill and would have no objection to its being parceled out.

Mr. BLANTON. I have promised that time to my Democratic colleagues who want to speak against this bill.

Mr. MAPES. Reserving the right to object, there was a good deal in the announcement by the lady from New Jersey that is not put in the Speaker's request. The request is to divide the time three ways. The Committee on Rules has reached the conclusion that it is better policy to confine the control of general debate on a bill to the chairman of the committee reporting the bill and the ranking minority member of the committee. I have no objection to putting the bill over for special consideration 3 weeks from today and giving 2 hours for debate, to be controlled by the lady from New Jersey and the ranking Republican member of the District Committee. If that request is made, I shall not object, but I think we should not go any further than that. As the gentleman from Georgia has indicated, I do not see how two or three Members can bind the House, and certainly they cannot agree that the House will stay in session until a vote is taken on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. That was not in the request put by the Speaker.

Mr. MAPES. I understand that, but I thought, in view of what has been said, that it should be clearly understood that the agreement did not go any further than the Speaker's request.

The SPEAKER. The request put by the Chair would control.

Mr. MAPES. I think, in justice to all, that that should be definitely understood.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Does not the trouble arise because when this bill was under consideration, when last considered by the House, numerous Members were recognized for 1 hour each, and the Chair held at that time that these men who were recognized, regardless of the number, would each have 1 hour, and that they might parcel out that hour as they saw fit? That is where our trouble comes. It seemed to me at the time that that was an erroneous ruling. Under that ruling the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would be entitled to what he has left of his hour to distribute, and anyone else who is recognized under the rules would also have the right to parcel out the remaining time of the hour. I hope the Chair will clarify that rule.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker did not occupy the chair at the time the ruling was made. The Chair is informed that only two Members were recognized when the bill was under consideration 2 weeks ago, the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. MICHENER. There was some discussion about the rule. I talked to the Parliamentarian at the time, and, as I understand, the opinion of the Parliamentarian and of the occupant of the chair at the time was that anyone recognized would be entitled to an hour.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MICHENER. Two Members were recognized, and that there might as well have been more than two.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. In order that the House may understand the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey, the Chair will state it again. As the Chair understands it, it is that this bill (H. R. 11563) be laid aside until the next District day, which is 3 weeks from today, and that at that time it be taken up and general debate be limited to 2 hours, 1 hour to be controlled by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, 40 minutes by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Is there objection?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know just how this committee can make an agreement that the House will stay in session until a vote is had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not include that in his statement. The request submitted by the Chair controls. That was not included in that request.

Mr. MAPES. I object to the division of time three ways.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for. Is there objection?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. We are considering an important matter, and I think we ought to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 45]

Dietrich	Lundeen	Sadowski

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirty-six Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11563) declaring an emergency in the housing condition in the District of Columbia, creating a rent commission for the District of Columbia, prescribing powers and duties of the commission, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 2 hours, 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], 40 minutes by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and 1 hour by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it is bad practice to divide the time among individuals, and for that reason I object.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate on the bill H. R. 11563 be limited to 2 hours, one-half the time to be controlled by the ranking minority member [Mr. DIRKSEN] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey that general debate on the bill be limited to 2 hours, one-half to be controlled by herself and one-half by the ranking minority member.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the rules of the House, while in the Committee of the Whole, in accordance with a custom running back to the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, I was recognized by the Chairman for 1 hour. I used 20 minutes of that time and I reserved 40 minutes, and agreed to yield it to other Members. If the motion now made by the gentleman from New Jersey should prevail, will that interfere with that situation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes it will.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the effect of her motion is to prevent my opposing her bill in debate. I think it would be unfair if such a motion as that prevailed, and I hope it will be voted down. However, regardless of the vote on her motion, I know how to get time to oppose the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were ayes 112 and noes 6.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 264, nays 31, not voting 135, as follows:

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11563) declaring an emergency in the housing condition in the District of Columbia, creating a rent commission for the District of Columbia, prescribing powers and duties of the commission, and for other purposes, with Mr. DIES in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret more than I can say that the Members of the House, many of whom are engaged in very important business in committees, have been brought here five times today to answer roll calls. I want it to appear in the RECORD that the chairman of this committee regrets the time it has taken the Members to come here and record their votes. It does not seem quite fair, as I said 2 weeks ago when this bill was before the House, to filibuster. It is perfectly all right with the chairman of the committee and with the Committee on the District of Columbia to debate a bill and vote on its merits, whether the outcome be favorable to the committee or otherwise, but it is deeply regretted that filibustering tactics are continually employed against bills brought out by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Work of the Committee on the District of Columbia is probably more arduous than on any other committee of the House, with the exception, of course, of the major committees, and I do not think that even the major committees spend as much time holding hearings or have as many bills before them—bills that are of no interest to their districts. The Members who serve on the Committee on the District of Columbia, therefore, are doing a patriotic service for the whole country; and, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem quite fair that this committee should be treated in the fashion it has been treated today or was treated 2 weeks ago. Apart from this, however, I think it has helped the bill very considerably because of the publicity the bill has received in the papers. We of the District Committee have been receiving hundreds of letters from people all over the District telling us of the frightful conditions prevailing with regard to rents; and may I say to you that this bill does concern every Member of this House. Members on the Committee on the District of Columbia must necessarily do a great deal of work in which their constituents are not directly interested, but in this instance we are presenting a bill for the benefit of our friends and yours. There is probably not a Member of Congress who does not have constituents paying rent in Washington. We believe this bill is to their interests, especially to those who are receiving salaries of $1,260, $1,440, $1,680, $1,800, and $2,000, and whose rents are entirely out of proportion to their incomes.

Since this bill has been before the House, Mr. Chairman, I have had a great many Members of the House tell me that the rents they themselves have to pay are outrageous, and certainly they are in better position to pay high rents than these Government employees, who, if they want to live decently, are compelled to pay rents out of all proportion to their incomes.

I have here a petition with 10,000 signatures in favor of this District of Columbia emergency rent bill. I have also a list of the grievances and the results of a questionnaire circulated by the Washington Central Labor Union in collaboration with the Resettlement Administration. The Central Labor Union in the District of Columbia, Mr. Chairman, is very much interested in this bill. They have been coming to my office continually, asking that something be done about it.

Last year when this bill was before the House I was away, very ill. It was considered at that time, however, and no determination was made upon the bill. A filibuster prevented further action on it. This is the second day it has been before the House this session, with not much better result.

Mr. Chairman, I am making my plea for the people of the District of Columbia who are oppressed by the high rents some of the rent gougers in this city are charging. There are many fair-minded landlords and many fair-minded real-estate people. Some time ago we tried to get them together to see if they themselves could not bring about a better condition before we decided to legislate, but to the present time we have had no results whatsoever, so we were obliged in all fairness to the people of the District who depend on us for an equitable adjustment of such matters to bring this bill before the House.

All we ask, Mr. Chairman, is fair consideration of the bill. If it is a good bill, let us vote for it. If the Members, after the House has fully considered it, feel it is a bad bill, all right; we will vote it down; but, at least, in all justice and fairness, let us have a full and honest debate on the merits of this bill so we may be able to do something about the sad condition the people of this District are in at the present time as a result of one-half of 1 percent of vacancies. Certainly nobody can say that this is not an emergency.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN], the author of the bill, who has held hearings on the bill, who wrote the report on the bill, and who is familiar with each and every part of it. [Applause.]

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall use the time allotted to me by the gentlewoman from New Jersey, distinguished chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to explain the bill now under consideration. The bill creates a commission of three members for the purpose of fixing fair and equitable rentals in the District of Columbia.

This legislation is temporary, made so expressly, as you will see by the language of the bill appearing in line 4 of page 2, that the powers of the commission established under this legislation shall terminate in 3 years from the passage of this act. We are hopeful that by the end of this 3-year period, if not before, the emergency existing in the District of Columbia with regard to housing will have passed.

Each of these three commissioners is to receive a salary of $5,000 per annum payable semimonthly. When the bill was last under consideration certain Members objected that this salary was excessive. Mr. Chairman, in order to administer this law we must secure competent men, men who have had experience in life and who can judge the values of real estate and assess equities between landlords and tenants.

Surely that charge of an excessive salary was not made in earnest. I am certain if you can find competent men to administer this law, and those are the only men who should administer this law, you will not say a salary of $5,000 a year for such men is excessive.

The commission is also given power to appoint a secretary who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year. This means $250 a month. Surely that salary is not excessive.

The counsel for the commission shall receive a salary of $3,500 a year, which is a little less than $300 a month. Certainly that salary is not excessive.

The commission is also given the power to appoint such examiners, employees, and attorneys as are necessary in the performance of its duties. This provision was greatly objected to the last time the bill was up for consideration, but if my colleagues will turn to section 19, page 21, line 24, they will find that the entire appropriation for this commission is limited to $50,000. If this commission will do what I believe it will do, what the experts believe it will do, and what it is intended it shall do, it will be worth not only $50,000 to the taxpayers of the District of Columbia, but 10 or 20 times that much. Let me remind my colleagues that this $50,000 is not placed upon the taxpayers of the United States, but upon the taxpayers of the District, just as it ought to be, because this appropriation has to come out of District funds.

In addition to the three commissioners, the assessor of the District of Columbia, who knows more about the facts pertaining to real property in the District than any other person, is made an ex-officio member of the commission, and for his services he is to receive the sum of $500 in addition to the salary which he now receives. Mr. Chairman, that is the set-up of the commission.

What is the commission to do? The commission is charged by law with the duty, upon complaint or upon its own initiative, to inquire into rentals that are charged tenants in the District of Columbia. When the commission receives such a complaint or when it acts upon its own initiative, it is then charged with the duty of inquiring into various factors.

What are these factors? It has to inquire into the value—not "water" value, but the value today—of the piece of real property involved. It has to inquire into the expenses connected with that piece of property, the taxes, the services that are necessary, such as light, heat, elevator and janitor service, and so forth, whatever that may be; then the commission has to fix a rental that will be fair and reasonable to both tenant and owner of the property. It must allow to the owner a return upon the value of his property which is just and fair. We could not provide anything else, because if we did it would be taking private property without due process of law and without just compensation therefor. So that a landlord who is fair should not object to this bill.

The commission must hold open hearings, upon notice to the owner or agent collecting rents, to determine whether the rent or other conditions of a lease are fair and reasonable. The commission must make known its determination fixing the fair and reasonable rent and services to be furnished in any rental property or unit thereof within 60 days from the date of the filing of the complaint.

The commission may, and if requested shall, file with its determination the fair and reasonable value of the whole property, the net return to the owner, and such findings of fact as the commission deems proper and as the act requires on the evidence presented.

Any court of the United States or the District of Columbia in any suit involving landlord and tenant relations shall determine the rights and duties of the parties in accordance with the determinations of the commission relevant thereto.

The bill provides that despite the expiration of the term fixed by the lease the tenant may continue in possession and may not be evicted if he performs the conditions of the lease. The landlord may, upon notice given as required, secure possession of the property either for personal occupancy, or to make material repairs, or erect a new building, or if the tenant commits waste, nuisance, or breach of peace upon the premises. The tenant shall pay rent to the owner in accordance with the terms of the lease during the period between the service of the notice and the final decision in the proceeding for the recovery of possession. The rights of the tenant under this section shall cease if the tenant fails to pay rent.

The bill provides that the Commission's determination shall not be stayed during the pendency of the appeal. If the Commission increases the rent, it shall be paid to the landlord, or to the Commission, or a bond given to guarantee payment, if sustained on appeal. If the rent is decreased by the Commission and is set aside on appeal, the unpaid difference shall be added to future rent payments or sued for in the Municipal Court of the District of Columbia.

The bill provides that a change in the ownership of "rental property" shall not affect the determination of the Commission.

The fact is that rents today in many instances—in the majority of instances—in the city of Washington are excessive. It is a shame and a disgrace that people who come here from all parts of the United States for the purpose of serving their Government and our Government are held up and must pay excessive rentals before they are permitted to live here. Not only that but we found upon investigation that several thousand Government employees who work in the Government offices in the city of Washington cannot find quarters in Washington at rentals which they can afford to pay. They are, therefore, forced to go outside of the city limits, in many cases as far as 40 miles away. If it is necessary for an employee to travel some 40 miles to go to his place of work in the morning and then return to his home 40 miles in the evening, it will impair the efficiency of his work, it will undermine his health, and deteriorate the service which he would like to give and which he ought to give to the Government.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Our friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania is making such an enlightening speech that we ought to have a quorum present to hear him. I, therefore, make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDRESEN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is employing dilatory tactics in obstructing legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN] does not state a point of order.

The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DIES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11563) declaring an emergency in the housing condition in the District of Columbia; creating a rent commission for the District of Columbia; prescribing powers and duties of the commission, and for other purposes; and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, and 280 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Committee will resume its session.

The Committee resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 11563) with Mr. DIES in the chair.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, this proposed legislation is not new in our history. It is modeled after a bill which was passed by this Congress on October 22, 1919, and which applied, just as this bill does, to the District of Columbia. The District of Columbia rent law was amended on August 24, 1921, amended on May 24, 1922, and again on May 17, 1924.

It is also modeled after similar legislation which was enacted in the State of New York and which was passed by the Assembly of the State of New York on September 27, 1920.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to show you and the members of the Committee that the rent emergency which exists today in the District of Columbia is far greater than it was in 1919 when we passed a similar bill.

There were in the District of Columbia during 1920, which was the first year that the Rent Commission functioned, 90,000 Federal employees; in 1921, while the Commission was still functioning, there were only 79,000; in 1922 there were only 70,000; in 1923 there were 66,000; and in 1924 there were 64,000. As compared with the last number of 64,000, on January 31, 1936, there were 112,349 Federal employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chairman, this figure does not include the 12,000 or 13,000 employees of the government of the District of Columbia; neither does it include about 3,000 employees in the legislative branch located in the District of Columbia or about 500 employees employed in the judicial branch and located in the District of Columbia.

Anyone who has examined these figures, showing an increase of nearly 75 percent in the number of employees of the Federal Government located in the District of Columbia, must surely admit that we are faced today with an emergency and with an influx of people into the city such as we have never had before.

Not only this, but today the number of vacancies available in the District of Columbia as compared with the number of apartments and homes existing in the District of Columbia is limited to one-half of 1 percent, whereas the normal vacancies would approximate 5 to 10 percent. We cannot speak of the functioning of the law of supply and demand unless we have vacancies approximating from 5 percent to 10 percent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I am sorry I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. Oliver S. Metzertott, the chairman of the former Rent Commission, testified before our committee; and in order to answer the claim that has been made against the bill that the former Rent Commission increased rents he showed us the report of the Commission—that it had decreased rents. He said to the subcommittee:

I believe there is just as much reason for the regulation of rental property as there is in regulating other things that are used by the public. In one Supreme Court case the Court very carefully pointed out that it is no more unreasonable to regulate the terms or the rent from real estate than it is to pass certain laws; in fact, it said that they thought certain laws were less unreasonable. I believe that the owner of real estate who is holding that property in a jurisdiction where a properly conceived rental board is in existence is not injured, but in the long run will be benefited by it.

The report of the previous Rent Commission, which was made to President Coolidge on May 22, 1925, pointed out at pages 10 and 11 that building construction was not affected by rent legislation. Mr. Metzertott signed that report as chairman of the Commission, which contained a number of recommendations and conclusions, among which was the following:

The only effective protection for tenants of the District is rent regulation by an administrative body created by Congress * * *

Mr. Chairman, the Utilities Commission in the District of Columbia has shown the need for this legislation.

The 1934 report of the Public Utilities Commission on rents and housing conditions in the District of Columbia showed:

That from 1932 until the depression was well under way rentals in the District of Columbia showed a continual increase.

That many cities showed decreases long in advance of those in the District.

That rents decreased less in Washington than in any other city.

That at the time the report was made, January 30, 1934, rents were still 20 percent above the average for the entire country.

That recent arrivals invariably find Washington rents higher, and frequently considerably higher, than they are elsewhere.

In this report on rent and housing conditions in the District of Columbia it was said:

* * * There is certainly a shortage of small houses carrying rents which the lowest paid workers and middle classes can afford.

These conclusions regarding regulation and housing are not new and should not be considered in any sense as merely the result of temporary or emergency conditions. In the report of the Public Utilities Commission of January 30, 1934, it was said in discussing the experience under the Rent Commission legislation:

Emergency hardly seemed the proper word to apply to a condition which for the wage earner and the man of moderate income had become chronic. The only real basis for rent legislation is under the police power inherent in Congress to regulate rentals of properties held out to the public and thereby affected with a public interest. Shelter, if not the prime necessity of life, is at least one of the most essential requisites. Regulation of this sort is essential to the welfare of the community.

The existence of this emergency is shown by the conclusion of the Public Utilities Commission in its report, where it is said:

Great need exists for the regulation of the housing business in Washington. * * * The problems of the landlord and the tenant cannot be met satisfactorily except by establishment of a proper public office made self-sustaining by license or registration fees, which would have as its business the inspection and arbitration of landlord and tenant complaints, the licensing or registration of all landlords and tenants, the keeping of complete housing records, and the establishment of minimum standards for housing in the District of Columbia.

The report of the Public Utilities Commission contained the following significant statement:

Restoration of rents to predepression levels would force Government workers, in the absence of a regulatory law, to adopt one of two unpleasant alternatives to the payment of such rents: To "double up", as they recently did, or to engage in the bitterness and injustices of a general rent strike. No one would gain if either course was followed. The Commission believes that the public would express its resentment at any general rent increases at this time.

The aim of this bill is to prevent such "doubling up", because it results in undesirable health conditions where people are so crowded together that they cannot eat, sleep, and live in a decent manner. Secondly, the aim of this bill is to prevent unnecessary "doubling up", because in the long run it only is disadvantageous to the landlords. As the Commission stated, no one gains from such action. This bill would protect both landlord and tenant in this connection.

The aim of the bill, therefore, is not only to prevent unreasonable and unjust rental increases which result in voluntary or involuntary removals, but to guarantee to the tenant, if he pays a reasonable rent and meets his just obligations, the occupancy of his living quarters.

The bill makes every effort to protect the tenant in this emergency situation but does so not in any manner unfair or unreasonable to the owner of any rental property. By creating an administrative agency to hear and determine complaints there will be guaranteed equity to both tenant and owner. By making it necessary for the commission to consider what the return on the owner's investment will be on the basis of the commission's determination, every protection is given the owner of a just and reasonable return on his property.

The fact that there are and have been abuses in the housing situation was brought out by the statements of Mr. Leroy Halbert, director of research of the Emergency Relief Division of the Board of Public Welfare in his testimony before the Senate District Subcommittee on Rental Investigation in 1932. Mr. Halbert said in speaking of the relief situation then:

I would like to call attention to one thing I consider an abuse. There are landlords who issue an eviction notice every month to keep people scared. Some of them have been paying their rent along for a year who have had an eviction notice every month, and the cost of that is charged up to them on top of their rents because the landlords think that is a good way to keep them keyed up to pay their rents.

This legislation aims to prevent and correct the existence or possibilities of such abuses as these. It aims to give employees, both Federal and non-Federal, the safeguard that during this period of great emergency they will have shelter at reasonable and just rates.

Now, let me give you some figures and facts that I think will interest you. Nearly 55 percent of the homes in the United States in 1930 rented for less than $30 per month, while in the city of Washington only 22 percent were available for less than $30 per month. The average in the country was 55 percent in 1930, but in the city of Washington it was only 22 percent.

Let me give you some further information, and this information was prepared by the United States Department of Labor. This Department showed that from June 1929 to December 1933 the rents decreased less in Washington than in any other of the 32 cities for which they collected data. While rents decreased on an average of 32.3 percent in all the 32 cities, in Washington this decrease amounted to only 12 percent.

Mr. Chairman, I now want to show you who is opposing this proposed legislation.

The investigation by the Senate committee showed that the 23 firms in the District of Columbia represented 17,816 dwelling units out of the 70,000. These 23 firms are engaged in a conspiracy to increase the rents in the District of Columbia. These 23 firms are the ones that are trying to kill this legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. No; I cannot at this time. Not only that, but the Senate committee shows that of these 23 firms, 12 representing 14,845 in the District of Columbia, and that means that the 12 firms control nearly 40 percent of the available dwelling units in the District.

The hearings before a subcommittee of the Senate District Committee on Senate resolution 248, at page 507, show the data presented by Mr. O. H. Brinkman, counsel to the committee, with the data presented from which I have just quoted.

Here is what Mr. Brinkman, who was the investigator for the Senate, said at page 508 of the Senate hearings on Senate Resolution 248 of the Seventy-third Congress:

From the foregoing it will be seen that there were in existence and working in close harmony a number of organizations of real-estate agents, owners of apartment properties, and bankers and mortgage loan agents, all having as their common object the "stabilization" of the notoriously high rentals of the District of Columbia and the high prices of Washington real estate.

This closely knit and interlocking combination of building and financial interests has had complete control over probably the majority of apartment houses and mortgaged single dwellings in the District of Columbia.

So the Senate in 1932 found there was an unlawful conspiracy existing in the District of Columbia; and I say on this floor, Mr. Chairman, on my responsibility as a Member of Congress, that it is an unlawful conspiracy that is today trying to thwart the will of the people and kill this legislation without a hearing. [Applause.]

Mr. Brinkman made a careful examination of the minutes and other records of the Washington Real Estate Board, and Mr. Brinkman's conclusions are found, beginning on page 494 of the 1932 Senate investigation hearings, as follows:

These records clearly show upon even casual examination, confirmed by close study, the existence of a combination unlawful in its nature and purpose and oppressive to home buyers and tenants in the District of Columbia, as well as in suburbs adjacent to the District.

Mr. Brinkman showed that the purpose and effect of this combination of real-estate owners and agents was to—

1. Use concerted effort to prevent rent reductions or even slight concessions to tenants.
2. Agree upon and fix minimum and excessive scales of commission for loans upon real estate. * * *

6. Restrained and restricted the giving of free rent as inducement to tenants to sign leases.

7. Held meetings of agents at which it was agreed that rent reductions and repairs of apartments were not "advisable."

8. Establishment by unpublished or unwritten rule of a "black-list" of tenants who had leases with other members of the combination who were unwilling to release them so that they might move, even in cases of dire necessity.

9. Continued effort to restrict apartment properties to the control of one agent only, so that there would be no competition between agents who were members of the board in renting apartments in the same building.

10. Agreeing and fixing of a "standard" minimum commission of 5 percent for the collection of rentals and the management of apartment properties, thus limiting and preventing the benefit of competition for management business, which previously had been handled for 3 percent in many cases.

11. Concerted effort by the Washington Real Estate Board, through a governing committee, to influence judges of the municipal court not to extend leniency in eviction cases to tenants who were about to be moved out into the street without shelter.

12. Attempt to influence newspapers of Washington not to print real-estate advertisements containing such statements as "no agents or brokers need apply."

Mr. Brinkman concluded:

The effect upon landlords and tenants of the unlawful combination was to increase expenses. Not only were the owners of apartment houses burdened with excessive financing charges . . . they were obliged by concerted action and price-fixing activities of board members to pay 5-percent commission—an additional expense which was bound to have an influence in curtailing rent reduction.

In order to protect the interest of the public rents must be regulated in the District. Such regulation must be founded upon protection to all parties concerned. The tenant must be given living quarters for a fair and reasonable rental; the landlord must be paid a rental that will enable him to make a fair and reasonable return on fair investment; the public must be protected from unhealthy and insanitary conditions. H. R. 11563 will accomplish all these purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what about the constitutionality as the basis for this legislation. The act which was passed in 1919 by Congress for the District of Columbia about a year after the war came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Block v. Hirsh (256 U. S. 135)—that law was held constitutional.

A similar law passed in the State of New York came before the Supreme Court and was held constitutional.

Then, there is the case of Marcus Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman (265 U. S. 170) establishing a rent commission to fix fair and reasonable rents was held justified under the police powers during the period of the emergency. It held that Congress and the State legislature had a right to pass such legislation.

The Supreme Court held further that such legislation was not invalidated because it deprived the owner of a jury trial on the question of the right to possession and declared that compelling the owner to furnish services to the tenant did not constitute an imposition of involuntary servitude in violation of the thirteenth amendment.

Authority to legislate for the District of Columbia is to be found in the Constitution. The bill modeled after the District of Columbia rent law and the New York rent law of September 27, 1920, is valid, according to the case of the Chastleton Corporation v. Sinclair (264 U. S. 543 (1924)) so long as the emergency continues.

The influx of Government employees into Washington, which created the emergency considered the basis for the constitutionality of the earlier legislation, applies with equal force to present conditions occasioned, as the statement of public policy in the bill declares, by the war against the depression.

During the life of the legislation which was adopted in the District of Columbia and New York after the war the courts in a number of decisions passed upon different phases of the acts and held valid provisions which authorized the commission upon its own initiative and without complaint to fix the reasonable rent, fix the fair return for rental property, compensate the tenant for inconvenience in connection with his occupancy, permit possession after the expiration of the lease if the tenant continued to pay rent as provided in the lease, and limited review by an appellate court to errors of law.

Unless the Supreme Court departs radically from the principles pronounced in the cases which have been referred to, the legislation being considered may not be challenged on the ground of constitutionality.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. May I have 5 minutes more?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the Committee to a resolution passed by the District Committee of the Senate of the United States in June 1932, which reads as follows:

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the committee that a combine between property owners and agents exists, the effect of which is to maintain an exorbitant charge for living quarters in the District of Columbia.

Resolved, . . . That it is the sense of the committee that rental properties, apartments, and hotels are affected with a public interest. This policy was formulated in July 1919, and it may well be that prevailing economic conditions justify a revival of the Rent Commission. . . .

That resolution was passed by the District Committee of the Senate of the United States.

In Senate Resolution 248, adopted by the Senate itself at the Seventy-second Congress, first session, it was stated, in part:

. . . the public of the District is paying high rents based upon inflated and fictitious values of rental properties. . . . the Committee on the District of Columbia believes the health and general welfare of the people of said District to be imperiled by the exorbitant demands of landlords. . . .

Is not this statement ample testimony that an emergency has and does exist here in the District of Columbia?

During and as a result of the entire investigation brought about by this Senate resolution, Mr. O. H. Brinkman, counsel to the subcommittee which held the hearings, presented the following as his last point in a series of 11 recommendations to the subcommittee:

11. That Congress declare that a condition of emergency as to housing exists in the District of Columbia, and further declare that housing is a public utility, vesting authority in a housing division of the Public Utilities Commission to regulate rents during a period of 2 years, and to regulate other matters relating to housing in the District.

Mr. Brinkman concluded:

So-called private initiative since the termination of the rent commission has failed utterly to provide the Capital of the Nation with decent and reasonably priced housing accommodations for employees of the Government and thousands of others necessarily living in the District of Columbia. For that reason it would seem reasonable and proper for the Government to exercise its power, based on duty, to protect the welfare of the people.

Mrs. John Boyle, Jr., chairman of the Consumers' Council of Washington, D. C., representing 150,000 consumers in the District of Columbia, working under the general direction of the National Emergency Council, presented this resolution that was adopted by the Consumers' Council to the subcommittee:

Whereas housing conditions in the District of Columbia are such as to injure the public health, welfare, morals, comfort, and convenience in that—

- (a) A scarcity of rental housing persists and is becoming more serious; and
- (b) Rents have been increased in many instances as a result of this scarcity. . . .; and
- (c) The housing of low-income families presents numerous conditions which are socially and economically undesirable; and
- (d) Private enterprise is not meeting the housing needs of the public: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Executive Board of the Consumers Council of Washington, D. C., That the Congress be requested to take such steps as may be necessary to secure to the public of the District of Columbia at the earliest possible time, effective alleviation of the conditions complained of. . . .

Do not these statements show that something must be done by Congress to alleviate the emergency which exists here?

I should like to have had another half hour to go into this bill, but since my time is so short and has nearly expired I wish to take a few minutes now to answer certain charges against the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. How many members of the Board are provided in the bill?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Three.

Mr. PATMAN. Where will these members reside?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. These members are to be appointed by the President and they may reside anywhere in the United States. They are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. PATMAN. Since almost anyone here in the District will have an interest directly or indirectly, would the gentleman agree to an amendment which would permit the appointment of the Board from people living entirely outside the District?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I should be glad to agree to that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. For a short question.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman agree to an amendment that the other employees will be taken from outside the District.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. They may be, under this bill, but I should be very glad to agree to such an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman admits that they may do that?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Under this bill they may certainly be taken from outside. I think it is clear in the bill, but if the gentleman thinks it is not clear I would agree to such an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman for his admission. That is what I was trying to get him to admit.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But if you bring all these employees in from the outside would not that make the housing conditions worse?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Oh, you will not need so very many employees.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How many thousands of employees would administer the law?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Oh, not thousands at all, not even hundreds; just a few.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I shall be glad to when I have finished. The charge has been made that this Commission will not decrease but will increase rents. If this Commission would increase the rents, why does the real estate ring in Washington oppose it? Everyone knows that if this Commission would increase and not decrease rents there would be no opposition from the real-estate interests in Washington; in fact, they would be here lobbying for it.

Mr. GREEN. Has the gentleman found any opposition to the bill except from the real-estate men who are interested, and are they not the only ones who are opposing the bill?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. None other than I know of. It is also charged by some Members of the House that the cost would be excessive. That charge is answered by the fact that the bill limits the expenses to $50,000. It has been charged that it would take 10 years to get rid of the Commission, a charge that is absurd in the face of the fact that the bill itself limits it to 3 years, and that it can be repealed by Congress at any time, but could not be extended beyond 3 years without a further act of Congress.

Let me answer some of the arguments that have been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] against this bill, and I ask his attention for a moment. Before I go into this I must inform the House that on February 1, 1935, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] introduced House Joint Resolution 150, in which he tried to accomplish a similar thing at that time. Evidently the gentleman was convinced that rents in the District of Columbia were far too high and that they needed regulation. Let me read you section 2 of that resolution:

It is hereby declared that the provisions of this resolution are made necessary by conditions resulting from the sudden and great expansion of activities of the Federal Government during the present acute economic emergency, which, in connection with other circumstances arising in such emergency, have resulted in a shortage of housing space in the District of Columbia and in rental conditions in the District of Columbia dangerous to the public health and burdensome to public officers and employees whose duties require them to reside within the District of Columbia, and other persons whose activities are essential to the maintenance and comfort of such officers and employees, and thereby embarrassing to the Federal Government in the transaction of public business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey give me 5 minutes more?

Mrs. NORTON. I am sorry, but my time is entirely taken.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentlewoman give me 2 minutes more?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 1 minute more.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I must answer the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. The gentleman from Illinois pointed out the fact that my bill contains a provision that new buildings in course of construction when the act was passed, or to be constructed hereafter, are excepted from the bill and that that would be discrimination, which would make the bill unconstitutional.

Any doubt as to the validity of the type of classification effected by the inclusion of the provision exempting from regulations houses in the course of construction or whose construction is to be commenced subsequent to the effective date of the act, is easily resolved. The New York emergency rent law passed in 1920 (c. 944, Laws of 1920, amending c. 136, Laws of 1920), contained a provision, as follows:

10. This act, as hereby amended, shall not apply to a new building in the course of construction at the time this amendment takes effect or commence thereafter, and shall be in force until November 1, 1922.

It will be observed that the provision in the New York law was to all intents and purposes identical with section 21 of H. R. 11563. The validity of the provision in the New York law came up for consideration by the Supreme Court in the case of Marcus Brown Holding Co. v. Feldman et al. (256 U. S. 170 (1921)). In that case the brief of the appellant as digested on page 180 of the United States Reports argued:

Assuming that the State has the power, directly or indirectly, to subsidize new buildings either by cash payments or by remission of taxes, it has no power to discriminate between existing buildings and the owners of buildings to be erected, in respect to their compensation for the use of their property.

In answer to this contention, Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the Court, stated on page 198:

It is said, too, that the laws are discriminatory, in respect of the cities affected and the character of the buildings, the laws not extending to buildings occupied for business purposes, hotel property, or buildings now in the course of erection, etc. But as the evil to be met was a very pressing want of shelter in certain crowded centers, the classification was too obviously justified to need explanation beyond repeating what was said below as to new buildings, that the unknown cost of completing them and the need to encourage such structures sufficiently explain the last item on the excepted list.

This case is a direct and unimpeachable constitutional precedent for the inclusion of section 21. In the face of this authority, how can it be argued that the provision is unconstitutional? The power of Congress to select the subjects of its regulation or taxation in legislation has been recognized in numerous cases decided by the Supreme Court. The only limitation upon such classification is that imposed by the due-process clause of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. Due process requires that the classification be not arbitrary and capricious and that it have some reasonable relation to the purpose of the legislation.

Such reasonable relation is easily discernible in the classification attempted by section 21 of H. R. 11563 in that the object of the statute is to relieve oppressive housing conditions. Legislation which discourages building activities tends to intensify the conditions sought to be alleviated; legislation which favors and encourages building activities is one direct means of achieving the purpose of the statute.

Hence a provision which exempts houses under construction at the time of the effective date of the act or commenced thereafter has a reasonable relation to the purposes of the legislation and does not constitute an invalid classification.

I invite the gentleman's attention to the opinion of the Supreme Court, which discussed the New York law, which contained the same provision. The Supreme Court said that such a clause would not be discriminatory, but was proper classification because it was in the interest of providing additional apartments and houses. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE], a member of the committee.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, the rules of the House prevent me from using the language that was used by a great many Members coming here answering six roll calls this afternoon, owing to the fact that several Members have undertaken to chastise the entire House by filibustering on a bill of this kind. We members of the committee resent the attack that has been made upon our chairman in doing everything they possibly could to stop us from legislating for the best interests of the people of the District of Columbia. I want to say, as one member of this committee, that I am not going to allow anyone to stand in my way, irrespective of who he may be or what he thinks of me.

Just think of what has happened, and the time that has been lost in six roll calls. Very important committees are meeting right at this moment on flood control. They have had to stop six times to come here and answer roll calls. Members of the Committee on Appropriations, six times; members of the Ways and Means Committee, six times; members of the Committee on the Judiciary have had to come here six times. For what? Owing to the fact that one or two men want to carry on a filibuster, opposed to the people of the District of Columbia receiving some relief. They are today being gouged by real-estate men. I wonder if the sinister influences are working to the best interests of these gentlemen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

Mr. SCHULTE. I want the gentleman to wait.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask that the gentleman be made to sit down and that his words be taken down.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman cannot make me sit down.

Mr. BLANTON. I can do it. I ask that the gentleman be made to take his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

I wonder if the sinister influences are working to the best interests of these gentlemen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want the full reference there; I want sufficient of the words taken down to show that the reference was to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and myself, who caused these roll calls to be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the words objected to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHULTE. Owing to the fact that one or two men want to carry on a filibuster, opposed to the people of the District of Columbia receiving some relief. They are today being gouged by real-estate men. I wonder if the sinister influences are working to the best interests of these gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise.

The Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DIES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11563, certain words used in debate were objected to, which, on request, were taken down and read at the Clerk's desk, and that he reported the same herewith to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the words objected to in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCHULTE. Owing to the fact that one or two men want to carry on a filibuster, opposed to the people of the District of Columbia receiving some relief. They are today being gouged by real-estate men. I wonder if the sinister influences are working to the best interests of these gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

There is no reference in the language to just who is carrying on a filibuster, if one has been carried on during the day. [Laughter.] The Chair is not in position to say that there has been a filibuster carried on. We have had a number of roll calls. The Chair is not going to say officially that there has been an actual filibuster. No reference is made to any particular Member of the House in the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana.

The Chair fails to see anything objectionable in the language referred to, and so holds.

The Committee will resume its session.

The Committee resumed consideration of the bill H. R. 11563, with Mr. DIES in the chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman proceed in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, there is no necessity for that motion. The remarks of the gentleman from Indiana have not been ruled out of order. The motion itself is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has not been ruled out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not rule that he was.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that these conditions do arise, especially so when there is a little relief in sight for the poor souls who are being oppressed. A bitter fight has been waged on this particular piece of legislation, a piece of legislation that is going to benefit every man that is here in the District of Columbia and the constituents of every Member of the House as well. They are trying to make this a model ordinance, a model law, that will show to the universe that we are trying to help someone by giving an opportunity to some of the other States to relieve those who are being oppressed.

Think of the situation of these low-paid employees. Here is a little stenographer, earning perhaps not over $120 a month, whose rent is $65 or $70 a month, if he or she is fortunate enough to secure a flat or a one-room apartment at that figure.

There is no question in the mind of anyone here but what if this bill is enacted into law it will afford relief to these people whom we are trying to help and protect in spite of the men who are trying to block this legislation.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I am glad to yield to the chairman of our committee.

Mrs. NORTON. On the point of roll calls, I sent an inquiry to the Congressional Library and I find that the roll calls today have cost the taxpayers of this country $3,324. It is estimated that a roll call costs $54, and that the value of the Members' time taken in a roll call amounts to $500.

So that the six roll calls have cost the taxpayers of the country $3,324. In speaking of the time of the Members taken from the various committees, I think that should be put in to make the record complete.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDREWS of New York) there were—ayes 17, noes 56.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have not forgotten the oath that I took as a Representative of the people of this Nation to support the Constitution of the United States.

Whenever I find a bill before this body that I believe is unconstitutional, from now on you will find me opposing it. I voted for some measures during the depression that I felt were unconstitutional. You could not stop them by a point of order, because under our rules that is a matter for the House to decide by its vote. It is a matter for the Supreme Court ultimately to decide under our system of a three-branch Government, all separate and distinct from each other.

I realized that the President of the United States was elected by the people to carry out a certain program of economic recovery. I felt that our President was entitled to have a chance to put his policies into effect. When bills have been brought up here by the administration during this depression period that I felt convinced were unconstitutional, I voted for them nevertheless, giving the President the benefit of every doubt, but I am not going to do it any more. The time has come when Members must vote in accordance with their oaths and in accordance with their judgment on these bills, and that is exactly what I expect to do in the future.

I have no apologies to make to anybody for doing anything and everything that is known to parliamentary skill to stop this bad bill, because I know that it is unconstitutional. Talk about expense to the Government in a roll call. That is foolish. We Members are here to answer all necessary roll calls, and all roll calls needed to stop a bad bill are necessary. Why, I would have 50 roll calls if it were necessary, and if it would stop this bill. What is more important about our service than to answer a necessary roll call? We would save thousands and thousands and even hundreds of thousands of dollars ultimately, provided we could stop this bad bill from passing and keep it from becoming a law.

Mr. Chairman, who has been fair about this business? They talk about a filibuster. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has been here a long time. He is one of the most valuable Members on the other side of the House. There is not a more valuable legislator who ever sat on the floor of this House than the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. He has done what he thought was his duty under his oath to stop this bad bill, whether it took roll calls or not. We Members who have been here a long time, and who know the business of this House, know that these roll calls have cost nothing. All of us here get regular salaries. All of us are paid for our full time. We are paid to answer roll calls. What is a roll call when it is a question of passing an unconstitutional measure and one that is against the very fundamental principles of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. Chairman, when this matter first came up we went to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] and tried to have a fair division of time in order properly to discuss this measure. We could not get an agreement out of him. That is the reason we filibustered to stop this bad bill. It was our only recourse. We were determined that this bill should be fully and properly debated on this floor.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I am sorry I cannot yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, again today we tried to get a reasonable agreement for proper debate. Under the rules of the House I was recognized heretofore by the Chairman. Under the rules I was entitled to 1 hour. I used 20 minutes of my time and, under the rules, reserved the balance of my time, which gave me the right to yield it to others. When I reserved that 40 minutes of time the rules gave me the right to yield to Members on the floor here who are against this bill and to whom I promised that time.

Did I not have the right to do that under the rules of the House? Certainly, I did, and who was unfair? Who made a motion to keep me from doing this? The chairman of the committee [Mrs. NORRIS] made a motion that prevented me from having the 40 minutes to which I was entitled under the rules of the House, and which 40 minutes she knew I had promised to eight other men who are against this bill, because I had told her about it, and in our agreement she had admitted I was entitled to it. Who was unfair about it?

Regarding the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] I will put my work here against his as to whether or not it is constructive, as to whether or not it has been beneficial to the people of the United States, as to whether or not it is free from every kind of "ism" you can think of except Americanism, as to whether or not it is absolutely free and untrammelled by any kind of interest. What interest has ever controlled me since I have been on this floor for 20 years? Not one. Talk about real-estate interests! Where is the real-estate interest that in any way influences me in this matter? Why, I do not know the real-estate men in Washington who may be interested against this bill and have not spoken to one in 10 years, to know it.

I am against this bill for three reasons. First, I know it is unconstitutional. You talk about an alleged acute housing situation. Why, get your Washington Star of yesterday and look at the great number of apartments now for rent, look at the great number of residences now for rent in Washington. Vacant residences and apartments without anybody in them; and then talk about a shortage of housing here. There is no such shortage in Washington. That is a farce on its face. The Supreme Court would knock this bill out so quick, if it were to pass, that it would make your head swim, provided it ever got the chance. The trouble about it is that this bad bill would be in effect for at least 2 years before it could ever reach the Supreme Court, and you would have all the evil effects from it for 2 years before it could be annulled.

I made the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] admit that every one of this army of employees—and they will have an army of high-salaried employees—they had an army of them before and it took us years and years to get rid of that expensive bureau—every one of them could be taken from outside of Washington, both officials and employees, and what effect would this have? It would increase and intensify the rental situation in Washington. You would have extra employees and officials coming in here and it would make the demand for apartments greater and the rents would go up.

Why, the very minute you would pass this bill and have a little old rent commission interfering and sneaking around into other people's private business and have this complaint after that complaint made against these apartment houses and other rental places, they would have to employ high-priced lawyers to protect their interests, and you would find rents, just like they did when we passed the other bill, going up at least 20 percent, for the extra expense would be passed on to the people who rent. When they passed the other bill my rent immediately went up $20 a month, and I had to pay this for several years. This is what will happen again if you pass this bill.

Besides its being unconstitutional and besides its not doing what they think it will do, but just the opposite, I want to show you what a useless, wasteful, expensive bureau it will create. I quote from the bill:

Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable semimonthly.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that is not a high salary. He says that somebody suggested $3,000 and he says $3,000 is too little. I will guarantee that there are some high officials in Washington who never drew as much as $3,000 a year in their life until they got a job with the Government.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield now. I may yield later, but I want to continue my own remarks now.

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. UMSTEAD]. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. After all, $3,000 is a pretty big salary. There are mighty few people in the United States, comparatively, who get over $3,000. Did you know that?

Do you know that in several States there are circuit judges now who try men for their lives, who try cases involving millions of dollars of property rights, who try domestic rights of families, who do not get much over $3,000? Do you know there are some governors who do not get much over that? The Governor of Texas gets only $4,000 per year salary.

And yet the gentleman wants to pay these little old rent commission members $5,000 a year. It is like one of our friends who is so sympathetic and big hearted with other people's money, the public money, that when the flood came he immediately introduced a bill or suggested one to appropriate a billion dollars for relief.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Congress has been appropriating money in such big sums that some do not know what a billion dollars means.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Of course I will yield to the gentleman, who is one of the biggest-hearted men in the House with other people's money.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Did not the gentleman vote for a $3,000,000 appropriation for the Texas centennial? That was public money, too.

Mr. BLANTON. That was to celebrate the centennial for a republic that brought into the Union immense landed territories that now constitute a great part of the United States. If my friend from Pennsylvania will go to Texas this year and get imbued with the principles that surround San Jacinto, where my mother's uncle, James Monroe Hill, happened to be with Gen. Sam Houston when General Santa Anna was captured, if he will go down around the Alamo and old Gonzales, and other places, he will get $3,000,000 worth of information and pleasure. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry, I cannot yield further. Let me quote section 4, and show you what is in this bill:

Sec. 4. Each commissioner shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable semi-monthly. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, and an attorney who shall receive a salary of $3,500 a year payable in like manner; and subject to the provisions of the civil-service laws, it may appoint and remove such other officers, examiners, engineers, appraisers, attorneys, employees, and agents and make such expenditures for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and other supplies and expenses as may be necessary to the administration of this act.

Do you know that eventually the above expensive new Bureau could cost us several hundred thousand dollars, if this bill should pass, before we could get it abolished? Why, like the last Commission, it could be extended and extended before the Supreme Court would get a chance at it.

Do you think the Secretary should receive $3,000? Do you think the regular attorney should receive $3,500? And notice that besides appointing officers, without limit, and examiners without limit, and engineers without limit, and appraisers without limit, the commission is given the carte blanc authority to appoint any number of extra attorneys without limit. The gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks they will be limited by the appropriation mentioned in this bill. When he has been here as long as I have he will know that if a bureau is given legislative authority to appoint officers, engineers, and lawyers, and employ people, without limitation as to numbers, and at a salary, not definitely fixed, and make contracts, Congress is going to pay for it. No Congress would turn down those contracts. I have seen it done many, many times, where a big bureau has been established, authority given to employ clerks and attorneys, Congress has always come in and made those contracts good.

I want you to notice again that this bill, in section 4, gives these commissioners carte blanc authority to employ any number "of officers, examiners, engineers, appraisers, attorneys, employees, and agents", without any limitation whatsoever, and that also without any limitation, this bill gives them carte blanc authority to make any amount of expenditures, with the blue sky as a limit, that they want to, for rent, printing, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, and to cap it all, any other supplies and expenses as it may deem necessary.

It could spend $50,000 for rent. It could spend $50,000 for law books. It could spend $100,000 for furniture. It could spend $25,000 for office equipment. Because, if it executed Government contracts for same, Congress would have to pay the bills, because this legislation gives the carte blanc authority.

Under Civil Service rules and the 1923 Classification Act I know officials here in the District of Columbia who get $9,000 a year, who before the act of 1923 was passed received only $5,000 per annum. I know an auditor here who gets $9,000 a year. I know a chief of police here under the said 1923 act who gets $8,000 a year and a fire chief here in the District of Columbia, under the same bill referred to, who gets $8,000. I know a superintendent of schools here who gets $10,000 a year, the biggest salary that any superintendent of schools gets in any comparable city in the United States. I know of numerous officers here who get $7,500 a year plus some of their expenses. Some of them just give part time. Lots of them are selling their services to other people on the outside.

Under this bill you could have an army of officers and employees here with big salaries, and we would have to pay for them, and that is what I am fighting against; that is why we had these absolutely necessary roll calls. I do not want this unconstitutional measure to pass. I do not want to see it become a law and have to go to the courts and run the gamut at the expense of our constituents and be held unconstitutional in the end at the expense of the people.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I regret I have not the time. You are not just authorizing the appointment of an army of officers. Remember that under this bill they can appoint examiners, engineers, appraisers, attorneys, employees, and agents, just as many as they may want, without any limitation whatsoever.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. DIES. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that section 24 of the bill gives Congress the right "to alter, amend, or repeal any provision of the act."

Mr. BLANTON. That is the most absurd, ridiculous provision I ever saw in a bill. That is absolutely childish; and if this high-class committee which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] talks about will stop bringing in fool measures like this, we will not have to filibuster to stop their passage. The idea of Congress reserving the right "to alter, amend, or repeal the act"! That is something fundamental under the Constitution of the United States. That is a right Congress already has, which Congress cannot take away. You can pass any kind of a law, and the next or the succeeding Congress, or any other Congress, could hold it null and void by passing a law repealing it or changing it in any way that it sees fit. We have no control on any future Congress.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment, if I should have time. Regarding the attorneys, without limit as to number, who, under this bill, this commission may appoint, their salaries are not fixed. Do gentlemen know that for one little bureau down here we have a lawyer who gets $16,500 a year? Do you know that at one time the Veterans' Bureau had 876 lawyers? Some were lawyerettes, but they got lawyers' salaries. That is what I am trying to stop. The people whom I represent in Texas do not believe in that sort of extravagance and waste.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The people I represent must not be like the people from the three districts in New Jersey or Indiana or Pennsylvania that are trying to put over this bad bill. I yield to my friend from New York, who has aided me materially in thus far stopping this bill.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman believe that any $16,500 lawyer drew this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I think the lawyer who drew this bill would not be able to earn 30 cents. A justice of the peace could draw a better bill than this.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Was the bill drafted by the legislative drafting service?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think that could be possible. It comes here by the Ellenbogen route from a part of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we functioned here a long time before the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] arrived, and we passed some pretty good laws before he came here, and we will pass some pretty good laws after he leaves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. UMSTEAD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11563, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made this afternoon and insert the remainder of the two news articles I read from.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BETTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters upon the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, some of us are hopeful that we will be able to finish the Pettengill bill tomorrow and have a vote on it. Unless the gentleman from New York has some very good reason why he should speak tomorrow, I think I would be obliged to object.

Mr. BETTER. I will state that I desire to speak tomorrow on the Public Works Administration.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, this morning I asked permission to insert in the RECORD a statement in regard to veterans' benefits, a statement that has required months to compile. It will answer every question that any veteran or dependents of veterans can ask. It is similar to a statement I prepared 2 years ago, of which several hundred thousand copies were printed and distributed to veterans' organizations. It is more full and complete. It is very much needed. There is not anything like it in existence now. It has been carefully prepared. It brings all laws and regulations down to date. It may be referred to as the "veterans' bible" on veterans' benefits and privileges. I believe it will answer 98 percent, if not more, of all questions that are usually asked on this subject. It will be a great benefit to veterans, their dependents and beneficiaries, veterans' organizations and representatives, and to Members of Congress. Mr. Earl D. Chesney, liaison representative of the Veterans' Administration, has assisted in its preparation. The Veterans' Administration has cooperated in its preparation and has gone over it carefully. It contains valuable information, and is as full and complete as it is possible to make it without quoting all laws and regulations. It includes not only pensions and benefits to veterans, but it also includes other benefits, including civil-service rights, and explains very fully every law relating to veterans. I hope to have it printed in pamphlet form in order that it may be made available to all interested parties. It will be about 48 pages, pamphlet size, and will likely cost $69.94 for the first thousand and $14.03 for each additional thousand. After the first thousand the cost will be less than 1½ cents each. No one will make any profit out of it, except the Government, on printing.

I ask unanimous consent, since the Printer has returned it with an estimate of cost, because it is more than two pages, that it be inserted in the RECORD, notwithstanding it has been returned under the rule requiring an estimate of cost. I have shown it to a number of Members, and the estimate of cost, and they all agree that it is a valuable compilation and should be inserted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FLOOD RELIEF

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, a telegram from the New England Council, regarding reconstruction as a result of the terrible flood in Massachusetts.

I also ask unanimous consent to insert, as a part of my remarks at this point, a radio speech I made to my people in Lowell, praising them for their wonderful courage during this recent disaster.

I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the House of Representatives, the President, and the entire country, will help us in our hour of great need.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, in connection with the last statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I want to call her attention to the fact that the President of the United States has already set aside the sum of $43,000,000 to be devoted exclusively to rehabilitation services in connection with the flood disaster.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I realize that; but I also realize that we are going to need a great deal more than $43,000,000. We need more money and more men to clear up the debris. The work must be done immediately or we shall have an epidemic.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Telegram]

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

We feel that next to relief of human distress in flood areas the resumption of operations by all industries is most important objective. We anticipate that many smaller industries may need financial assistance in repairing plants and reemploying workers, and we have already directed attention to loaning powers of Federal Reserve Bank and Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Suggest some definition of policy or broadening of authority by those two agencies might be helpful. We also urge necessary legislative and administrative actions to insure execution of pending river survey projects and creation of necessary State and interstate authorities so that our States can work together in execution of effective and coordinated program of interstate flood-control works.

DUDLEY HARMON,
Executive Vice President, New England Council.

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS OVER STATION WLH, LOWELL, MASS., SATURDAY, MARCH 21

First of all I want to say how immensely proud I am of the people of Lowell. You who have suffered such tremendous losses in this great catastrophe have made me proud by the way in which you have stood up under disaster. You who have risen to this emergency and have devoted your time and money to relief also make me proud that I belong to Lowell. I tried to fly from Washington yesterday so that I could be with you last night. All the airports at the Capital are under water, so I had to take the train, delaying my arrival until today.

There is not praise enough that I can offer the Red Cross for its work in this emergency. Not only the generals of the Red Cross have worked tirelessly but the privates have thrown themselves into the spirit of the emergency. Red tape has been cut; people have been fed, housed, and clothed to relieve any actual suffering. Homes have been thrown open. Churches have been placed at the disposal of refugees. Doctors and nurses have cooperated in long and arduous hours of duty. Women sewers of the W. P. A. have risen to the occasion and along with volunteers made the sandbags that saved the city from even worse damage. The women here worked from 12 noon until 4:30 the following morning—some being notified as they worked that their homes were lost and swept away. Telephone operators, the police, and firemen have worked without rest or relief. City workers and the W. P. A. men have remained on the firing line hour after hour without relief and for long periods, with no food or a chance to get dry clothing. The Legion veterans, of course, were on the job from the first moment of danger. They always are.

It is the same wartime spirit that dominated America when we faced the world crisis in 1917. But now it is mobilized as a peacetime cooperation to help and assist our neighbors and friends. I am tremendously proud of the way my home city has responded.

I have gone through the flooded areas and visited many of the refugee stations established by the Red Cross. We face a huge task of rehabilitation. It is my hope that much of the rebuilding and repair work on the homes damaged and destroyed can be done as a relief project. I shall press that matter on the President and relief heads on my return to Washington on Monday. I have already done so by telephone and telegram. Some assistance must be given our citizens who have lost their lifetime savings through no fault of their own. It will certainly be more constructive than some of the projects on which Federal funds have been expended.

Red tape must be cut. There can be no wasted time. Today I was able, fortunately, to expedite matters in several instances for the Red Cross and W. P. A. authorities. I might say here that the operators in our Lowell telephone exchange were of great assistance, getting my emergency calls through to the Capitol and to the White House.

I intend also to urge a larger share of the flood appropriation for New England. Also, I shall urge that funds available for increased W. P. A. activities in connection with the flood be released at once. Mr. Paul Edwards, State administrator of the W. P. A., has promised every cooperation possible.

Today I talked with the Washington W. P. A. headquarters in an effort to have emergency regulations that will permit the purchase of shoes and clothing, blankets, sheets, etc., locally. That would help industry and shops, as well as save time.

At my request, Mr. Paul Edwards came to Lowell this afternoon. Together we went over the flood situation, and I assure you he is heart and soul for any measures that will aid us here in Lowell. He is a fine, honorable, and able gentleman, deeply interested in this relief work. I feel sure of his cooperation in whatever is best for the Lowell district.

Today also, I have gone over the situation with Walter Relly, Theodore Reed, Dr. Marshall Alling, and William G. Spence of the Red Cross. We in Lowell owe them a tremendous debt of gratitude for the way they have taken hold in this emergency. Their great need at this moment is funds. I know Lowell will, as usual, be generous and give them the money to work with. It will be expended wisely and well, with not a wasted penny. The manner in which the whole city is taking hold and carrying on gives one a thrill and pride beyond expression. It has been estimated that there are 5,000 people homeless here. You and I know that they will be cared for.

Monday I will introduce enabling legislation to permit reconstruction, as an emergency measure, of Central Bridge, as part of the Federal highway system. This has been approved by Commissioner Callahan, of the State department of public works. This will provide work and Federal funds in the district.

I have also been in conference with your good mayor. He is about exhausted with lack of sleep and long hours of devotion to his city. He has given everything he had to prevent greater disaster and relieve the suffering. I have again offered him my cooperation in every movement to expedite rehabilitation of our city and relief for the victims.

I want, again, to tell you how wonderful you are in good times and in disaster. There are not words enough to say in praise of the spartan spirit of the disaster victims. You are already planning on a fresh start. I can see no reason why our Government should not help you with it. I know you will win through, as you always have. Your courage and fortitude are too great for words. Those who have given up their private interests to give their services to this relief—you, too, are too fine for words. The newspapers have done everything possible. Our Lowell radio station has united families, found lost members, assisted the police and relief agencies, and altogether made us happy to have WLH in our midst. Lowell will always be grateful to the neighboring towns, which sent men, provisions, boats, and other forms of assistance.

I shall carry back to Washington with me a picture of a great disaster, but also of a great city which has taken disaster as great Americans, already helping each other and planning for the future together as neighbors and friends.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY ORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may read a letter from the President of the United States addressed to the Speaker of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 20, 1936.

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,

The Speaker, United States House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Last October I began holding some conversations with interested and informed persons concerning what appealed to me as the necessity of making a careful study of the organization of the executive branch of the Government.

Many new agencies have been created during the emergency, some of which will, with the recovery, be dropped or greatly curtailed, while others, in order to meet the newly realized needs of the Nation, will have to be fitted into the permanent organization of the executive branch. One object of such a study would be to determine the best way to fit the newly created agencies or such parts of them as may become more or less permanent into the regular organization. To do this adequately and to assure the proper administrative machinery for the sound management of the executive branch, it is, in my opinion, necessary also to study as carefully as may be the existing regular organization. Conversations on this line were carried on by me during November and December, and I then determined to appoint a committee which would assist me in making such a study, with the primary purpose of considering the problem of administrative management. It is my intention shortly to name such a committee, with instructions to make its report to me in time so that the recommendations which may be based on the report may be submitted to the Seventy-fifth Congress.

The Senate has named a special committee to consider aspects of this general problem, and I respectfully suggest that the House of Representatives also create a special committee of a similar character through which the House of Representatives could cooperate with me and with the committee that I shall name in making this study in order that duplication of effort in the task of research may be avoided and to the end that this study may be made as fruitful as possible.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, but may in a moment withdraw the request, for the immediate consideration of a resolution I have prepared to carry into effect the President's request in reference to this matter.

In this connection, in order to save time, it is a somewhat lengthy resolution, I think it proper for me to state that I conferred with the minority leader about the matter, and I understood that he felt that under all the circumstances he would be constrained to object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I feel it is rather unusual to ask unanimous consent to consider such an important resolution as has been suggested by the majority leader. This matter has been before the Executive for 3 years. I do not see that he has taken any especially constructive steps along this line. This is a matter of great importance. It should be considered by the Rules Committee. Bearing in mind the fact it has gone over for 3 years, I do not think it would delay the matter very much if it went over a few days longer, and I shall be obliged to object to the last request of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution may be placed in the basket for consideration.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. SCOTT. I think this will be interesting to some Members of the House. This is a letter I received from one of my constituents:

TOWNSEND CLUB, No. 4,
Long Beach, Calif., March 16, 1936.

Hon. BYRON M. SCOTT,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SCOTT: As a good Democrat, a representative of the common people, why don't you try and get Congress to have a $50,000 investigation of the Republican National Committee and have them stop the racket they have started to sell to us doddering, deluded Republicans, worthless pieces of paper at a dollar a throw, for the purpose of paying the big bosses big salaries to try and defeat you loyal Democrats for office?

I believe us Republicans should be protected from these racketeers.

Yours for action—a lifelong Republican.

Yours truly,

A. H. PARSONS.

SENATOR CARTER GLASS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Owensboro (Ky.) Messenger, of Friday, March 20, 1936, relative to our esteemed friend the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. It is a very admirable editorial, commenting upon his life and his public service, and I think it is entitled to a place in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Owensboro (Ky.) Messenger of Mar. 20, 1936]

CARTER GLASS

Virginia's masterful Senator, whose 78 years have been filled with the romance of achievement, is about to add another chapter to his inspiring record as he faces an open field in his candidacy for a fourth term in the upper House of Congress.

Born in historic Lynchburg, he grew to manhood in the stirring days that survived the reconstruction era, and was 41 years old when he quit the editorial chair to enter the political arena as a member of the State senate. He served also as a member of the constitutional convention before entering Congress in the Fifty-seventh session.

For 18 years the fighting Lynchburg editor—he owns both morning and evening newspapers in his home city—made history in the National House of Representatives. He resigned in December 1918 to become President Woodrow Wilson's Secretary of the Treasury.

From the Cabinet it was but another step into the United States Senate, where he is now serving his third term. Ambitious Democrats have threatened to oppose him as election time draws near, but the candidates always fail to reach the starting place. He declined to surrender his toga to be President Roosevelt's Secretary of the Treasury, preferring to sit in the hall of contention, where his voice is heard whenever the principles of democracy are assailed.

As Representative and Senator, CARTER GLASS has labored with undiminished energy in the forum of banking and currency and for the farmers of the Nation. His Lynchburg newspapers occupy a commanding place in Virginia journalism, and the veteran editor uses them unsparingly to carry forward his political ideals, while he labors in the Senate, fearing naught but the rebukes of his own conscience.

A debater whose words cut like a rapier, he lacks the oratorical polish of a fellow citizen of Lynchburg, Senator John W. Daniel, but the glowing periods of "the lame lion of Lynchburg" were no more effective in his day than are the sharper sentences of GLASS, 14 years younger than Daniel, who died while in the Senate a few years before GLASS' first election.

CARTER GLASS is a Democrat among Democrats, who neither looks to the right nor left as he hews his way, steeled to any encounter with the fortifying power of confidence in his own ability. His own party honors him as a leader, and the Republicans are slow to kindle his ire as the ablest on that side of the Chamber have learned to their regret.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Commission Council of the City of New Orleans, La., favoring the enactment of legislation extending the time for completing the bridge across the Mississippi River between New Orleans and Gretna, La., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Donald W. Ballew, of Hill City, S. Dak., praying for the creation in each House of Congress of a committee on civil aviation, which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of Elsmore Grange, No. 1670, of Bronson, and Wide Awake Grange, No. 1913, of Liberal, in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1632, regulating commerce by water carriers, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition numerous signed by sundry citizens of White City, Kans., praying for the enactment of the so-called Robinson-Patman anti-price-discrimination bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a memorial from Rev. J. K. Jones, president, Atlantic Union Conference of Seventh Day Adventists, South Lancaster, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation imposing a tax on land acquired after January 1, 1936, by literary, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Central Labor Union of Northampton, Mass., favoring the enactment of the so-called Ellenbogen bill, relating to the textile industry, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented letters in the nature of petitions from the Animal Rescue Leagues of Boston and New Bedford, Mass., praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 2726) to prevent cruelty to animals during their transportation in interstate commerce and to repeal the act of Congress approved June 29, 1906 (34 Stat. 607; U. S. C., title 45, secs. 71-74), which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.
